Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman from Kentucky, in charge of the river and harbor bill, on the day when we last considered it, permitted the committee to rise in order that I might have a more convenient time for discussing the bill, it being then late in the day. In view of that fact, he now feels that it is hardly fair for me to interpose the objection of "no quorum," and, as he puts it strictly upon that personal ground, and as I desire to return all courtesies, I am personally willing to waive the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, not being myself compromised in that way, I renew the point of no quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The House again divided; and there were—yeas 155, nays 13, not voting 150; as follows:

So the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. CABELL. My colleague [Mr. CROXTON] is detained at home by sickness.

Mr. COWLES. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] has been compelled to leave the Hall to have his eyes treated.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. GALLINGER objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. TARSNEY with Mr. PETTIBONE, for the rest of the day.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. GROSVENOR, for the rest of the day.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. KELLEY, for the rest of the day.

Mr. HITT with Mr. CLEMENTS, for to-day, on the river and harbor bill. Mr. CLEMENTS, if present, would vote for the bill; Mr. HITT against it.

Mr. CROXTON with Mr. DAVIS, for this day; also on the increase of pension bill. If present Mr. DAVIS would vote for the bill; Mr. CROXTON against it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, with Mr. HOPKINS, on this vote.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, on this vote.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. HENLEY, on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I voted, Mr. Speaker, but as I am paired, I will withdraw my vote if it does not break the quorum. If it does, I will vote ay, because I think the gentleman with whom I am paired would vote that way.

The SPEAKER. There is a quorum without the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 1.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, and others. No quorum.

Mr. DUNHAM. Inasmuch as this side of the House is doing the filibustering on this bill, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope that motion will be voted down.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to amend so as to provide that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is not amendable.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 32, noes 75.

The SPEAKER. Upon the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House resolved to go into Committee of the Whole, the ayes are 124, the noes 1.

Mr THOMAS, of Wisconsin. No quorum.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 79 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 161, nays 18, not voting 139; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The following additional pairs were announced, all for the remainder of the day:

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. OATES with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, with Mr. HOPKINS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 161, the nays 18. The yeas have it; and the motion to reconsider is laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER (after a pause). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER].

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER declared that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Several members called for a division.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is the gentleman's motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the point of order had been made in time the motion could not have been entertained. The House had determined to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a motion to reconsider having been laid on the table; and under the rules, it was the duty of the Speaker to vacate the chair, so that the order of the House might be carried into effect. But the point of order was not made in time; and the Chair put the question.

Mr. WILLIS. If my friend from Iowa will withdraw his motion——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER] restate his motion?

Mr. CONGER. It is that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand the gentleman's motion. As he now states it it is not in order, because it proposes an adjournment to a different hour from that fixed by the standing order of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I modify the motion so as to provide for an adjournment until Tuesday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The motion is still out of order, because it proposes to fix a different hour for the meeting of the House from that fixed by the standing order. The gentleman might move a recess; but the regular hour of meeting can not be changed in the manner proposed.

Mr. NELSON. I insist on the point of order against the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain it at any rate, because it involves a change of a standing rule or order of the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. NELSON. I make a point of order upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the Chair can not entertain the motion. The House having resolved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it is the duty of the Speaker, under the rules, to vacate the chair, and the House is no longer in session as a House. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain that motion under the ruling just made. The House having refused to reconsider the vote by which it determined to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the Speaker, under the rules, vacates the chair. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], in the absence of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], will take the chair as chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10419) known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, no gentleman desiring to address the committee, I ask for the reading of the first section of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I believe, Mr. Chairman, there were thirty minutes of time allowed for general debate and that I was recognized for that period. I will yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five minutes remain for those in favor of the bill, and thirty-five minutes for those who are against it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, took the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I am occupying the time of the gentleman from Kansas and will do whatever he wishes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I yield to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the committee rise.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 64.

The CHAIRMAN. So the committee refuses to rise.

Mr. HEPBURN. But a quorum has not voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A quorum is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. If on a vote on a pending amendment a quorum does not appear the gentleman can then make his point.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I submit that the rule requires there should be a quorum present, and by the vote just taken it has been developed that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House a quorum is not necessary. It has been invariably held that a motion in committee to rise is equivalent to a motion in the House to adjourn, and a quorum in either case is not necessary.

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I make the point the demand comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair entertained the point of order and it has been overruled, the demand for tellers will be received.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It requires one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Whenever a quorum has failed to vote, tellers have been appointed.

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 36 voting in favor thereof—more than one-fifth of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. WILLIS and Mr. HEPBURN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 66.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is developed on the count there is no quorum in the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. No quorum is required.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to be heard for one moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is not in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. I submit it is necessary to have a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HEPBURN. On every occasion when it is apparent to the Chair, by any of the methods known to parliamentary proceeding, there is no quorum in committee, then the provisions of the rule are imperative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A quorum is not required in the Committee of the Whole House on a motion that the committee rise, for the reason that it is the equivalent of the motion to adjourn in the House, on which a quorum is not required, and also for the further reason that as the motion to adjourn has been held not to be "business," the motion that "the committee rise" is governed by the same rule. (See Journal, 1, 44, p. 1153, and also Congressional Record 2, 46, p. 3670, vol. 43.)

Mr. WILLIS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that all of this general debate will be closed now, since we have been for a long time making an effort to get into Committee of the Whole. Under the order of the House thirty minutes remain for debate on each side. I only ask that that debate be exhausted this evening in pursuance of that order, after which I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there remain thirty-six minutes against and thirty-five in favor of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, of all our great annual appropriation bills the easiest to assail and the hardest to defend is the annual river and harbor bill. It is easy to assail it here on the floor of this House, or in the public press, or on the stump; and it is usually hard to defend it in either place, even from unmerited criticism. The trouble, I think, is not so much with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors which frames the bill as with the system prevailing in this country under which all bills of this character are framed.

There are two methods by which a country can carry forward a system of river and harbor improvements. The one method is to have a board of public works and to leave the amounts to be spent on each separate improvement resting, to a certain degree, within the discretionary power of the board. Under such a system the board of public works would have the right to follow out a definite plan from year to year, subject to the control of Congress whenever such control seemed to be necessary. It could determine whether harbor A or harbor B should be pushed to completion this year or wait till next year. It could decide whether new projects should be started before the completion of works already begun; whether the funds allowed by Congress should be concentrated upon a few of the most important harbors and rivers or spread over a larger number.

In case a storm should injure an existing work and render necessary extraordinary repairs the board would have a discretionary power to meet the emergency by applying funds which, but for the emergency, it would have used elsewhere. If Congress became convinced, at any time, that the board was corrupt or extravagant it could always interfere by withholding or reducing appropriations or by prescribing rules which the board should follow. Congress would give the general rules. The details, such as the specific sum to be expended each year on each river and each harbor, great and small, would be left to the discretion of the board.

It is not my purpose just now, Mr. Chairman, to advocate the adoption of such a system of river and harbor improvements. I refer to it only for the purpose of illustrating the character of the other and very different system under which we are working in this country. The plan we have adopted is that of a Congressional board of public works. The board of public works which frames the scheme of public improvements in this country for each succeeding year is this House of Representatives and its Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Three hundred and twenty-five members of Congress, representing all the different sections of a great country, are theoretically supposed to examine and pass upon the details of every plan. They assume to give intelligent judgment on works of public improvement with which they can not possibly be familiar. In a large majority of cases, they know nothing and can know nothing of the improvement submitted to them, except what appears on the face of the bill.

On the face of the bill there is nothing to be seen but the name of a place and a sum of money. The result is that the House goes almost altogether by the judgment of the committee, while the committee in framing the bill appears to be guided first by the desire to keep the total of the bill so low that the newspapers of the country will not be offended, and next by the desire to spread the appropriations so judiciously over the different sections of the country as to gratify as many Congressional districts as possible. If there is anything wrong in this the committee is not to blame. It is the system. The committee acting under such a system must do as they do. It is their duty to make not only a bill that will pass but one which will evoke the minimum of criticism. The bill may be assailed here or elsewhere because the total amount is large, as was the case a few years ago when Congress appropriated $18,000,000. Hence the first duty of the committee is to determine just what total amount the newspapers of the country will stand.

Secondly, the bill may be assailed because some section of the country appears to have been neglected. People in one section of the country can not easily appreciate the importance of local improvements in other sections of the country. So the moderate sum fixed upon beforehand as the proper total is apportioned to the different parts of the country so as to give the least possible cause of complaint to the members of the House who have to vote for the bill and explain their votes, not to the people of the country at large, but to the voters of their respective districts.

Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to see a different system adopted this year or next year, perhaps not for many years to come. I want merely to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to one practical effect of the system. The effect is that no river and harbor work seems likely ever to be completed. New projects are incorporated in the bill every year by provisions for new surveys.

The estimates for all works in progress, new and old, amount to a formidable sum. The amount which the engineers say they could profitably spend during the next fiscal year is likewise a formidable sum. This year it amounts, as I understand, to about $30,000,000. But the committee are not willing to appropriate more than about $7,500,000. That is to say, they think they can not afford to allow more than about 25 per cent. of the total sum which the engineers think could be properly and economically expended during the next fiscal year on works which Congress has decided to be works of a national character. The practical result is that unless a given river or harbor appears to the committee to be exceptional in its character it can not expect an appropriation of more than one-quarter of the amount which the engineers think could be profitably expended on it during the next fiscal year. Under this system I have no doubt many important works of river and harbor improvement remain just so near completion from year to year. The appropriations of one year only suffice to make good the damage by storms during the preceding year.

Mr. Chairman, I have already said, and I say again, that I am not criticising the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Perhaps they do as well as any committee could. Perhaps if I were a member of the committee I should follow the same rule that they follow. There must be something wrong, however, in the system itself.

Now, I wish to point out how this rule, by which each harbor has an appropriation of 25 per cent. of the engineers' estimates, operates in the case of the harbor improvement with which I am most familiar—I refer to the outer breakwater, so-called, which lies about a mile north of the harbor of Chicago. I do not refer to the southerly breakwater which forms the harbor of Chicago properly so called. The latter is protected by the former, and it is this fact which gives the former, that is the outer or northerly breakwater, a special claim on the consideration of the committee. The northerly breakwater, in fact, makes of Chicago Harbor one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, harbor of refuge in the United States.

The system of harbor works adopted for the neighborhood of Chicago is thus described in the report of the engineer. He says:

The project of improvement now in course of construction at this harbor was adopted in 1870 and modified in 1878. The objects sought are, first, the formation of an outer harbor adjoining the entrance to the Chicago River and designed also to furnish increased commercial facilities by relieving the river from its overcrowded condition. Second (this is the point to which I desire to direct attention), the creation of a harbor of refuge affording a good anchorage in deep water and safe access to the outer harbor and river.

It is this northerly breakwater or outer harbor of refuge to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. I have here a copy of a recent report made by Major Handbury, the engineer in charge, to the Chief of Engineers. This report arrived only a few days ago, and I have this morning secured a copy which I shall turn over to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. WILLIS. I suggest to the gentleman that he can print it with his remarks.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Very well, I will ask leave to print this report, or extracts from it, with my remarks. In this report there are some tables, showing the number of arrivals and clearances at the port of Chicago, compared with the arrivals and clearances at several of the more important harbors on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I ask the particular attention of the committee to these tables. They show that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, the aggregate of the arrivals and clearances at the ports of Baltimore, Boston, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Portland, Falmouth, and San Francisco amounted to 37,414, while the arrivals and clearances at the port of Chicago alone during the same time amounted to 22,096. It appears that the arrivals and clearances at this single port exceeded in number the arrivals and clearances at Baltimore, Boston, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Portland, Falmouth, and San Francisco, which were only 21,227. They exceeded those at New York, New Orleans, Portland, Falmouth, and San Francisco, which were only 21,731. They exceeded those at New York, Baltimore, Portland, and Falmouth, which were only 21,996, and they exceeded those of New York, Philadelphia, Portland, and Falmouth, which amounted to 22,041.

If we compare the coastwise trade of Chicago with the coastwise trade of other ports, which I admit is not a fair comparison, it appears that the coastwise arrivals and clearances at the ports of Boston, Baltimore, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Portland, Falmouth, and San Francisco aggregated only 13,931, while the coastwise arrivals and clearances at the port of Chicago alone amounted to 21,564.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Who furnishes those tables?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The collector of the port furnished them to the engineer in charge.

Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to say that the value of the cargoes arriving and clearing at the port of Chicago can compare with the value of cargoes at the great seaboard cities. The committee will bear in mind that I am speaking of the outer breakwater north of Chicago Harbor, which is intended as a safeguard against shipwreck. The danger of shipwreck is in proportion to the number of arrivals rather than to the size of the vessels or the value of their cargoes. It is not merely the number of vessels arriving and clearing at Chicago that I wish to bring to the notice of the committee. I wish to notice also the lay of the land there and the prevailing course of the winds.

The greatest length of Lake Michigan, as all are aware, lies nearly due north and south. The prevailing wind is from the southwest. It is the return trade-wind, so-called. During the summer and autumn months, when the lake is covered with outgoing and incoming craft—it should be remembered that the immense lake trade of Chicago is concentrated into seven or eight months of the year—during the summer and fall, I say, after the southwest wind has been blowing steadily for two or three days, it often happens that the course of the wind changes sixteen points in a half hour, and then we have a gale from the northeast. A northeasterly gale, on a north and south lake, 70 miles wide and 300 miles long, causes a heavy sea at the southwest corner of the lake. That is the situation of Chicago on Lake Michigan. The sea is so heavy there that vessels are frequently cast ashore, and the piers and breakwaters forming the main harbor of Chicago have repeatedly been damaged. It was as a safeguard against these dangers, dangers to vessels and dangers to the Government works already constructed, that the outer or northerly breakwater was designed. In the recent report of Major Handbury, to which I have alluded, this outer breakwater is thus described:

A further improvement for the benefit of the lake commerce of this vicinity was commenced in 1881. This consists in an exterior breakwater to be, when finished, a little over a mile in length. It is located about 1 mile to the northeast of the mouth of the river. The object of this is to form a refuge to vessels in distress or when attempting to make Chicago harbor in stormy weather. There is yet 1,600 feet of this structure to be built. The great utility of this breakwater is proven during every storm that visits this locality by the many vessels that are found anchored under its protection.

The outer breakwater here referred to will extend from northwest to southeast. It lies across the course of the northeasterly gales. When completed it will do more than furnish an anchorage ground for vessels in distress. It will also protect the Government harbor works heretofore built south of it. Every vessel owner on the northern lakes is interested in its speedy completion. The Government also is interested as the owner of harbor works which it is designed to protect. Only about a year ago the southerly breakwater was damaged by a storm to the amount of $20,000. The engineer says in his annual report, which is in the hands of the committee, that he will deem it necessary to apply the first funds made available to the repair of the southerly breakwater in order that the remainder of the structure shall not be subjected to further destruction. If the northerly breakwater had been completed this damage, in all probability, would not have occurred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what has been the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in relation to this important work. Three years ago, if I remember right, $100,000 was appropriated. The engineer said at that time, I think, that he could profitably spend a much larger sum. There has never been a whisper of criticism against the integrity or ability of Major Benyaurd, who was then in charge, or against his successor, Major Handbury. Their estimates are entitled to implicit confidence. The next year there was no appropriation. The year following, that is last year, there was an appropriation of $75,000. What does the Committee on Rivers and Harbors propose to appropriate in this bill? They propose to give $60,000 to the harbor of Chicago. Of this sum, as I have already shown, $20,000 will be used to repair the damage caused a year ago to the southerly breakwater. It also appears from the annual report of the engineer (page 1702) that about $11,000 will be needed for securing the Government works north and south of the river from similar injuries. This will leave about $29,000 for the outer breakwater of the greatest harbor of refuge in the country.

Now, why is it that only $29,000 is appropriated toward the completion of this important work during the next fiscal year, when $75,000 was appropriated last year? Is it because it is less important than it was last year? Certainly not. In fact, the importance of the speedy completion of the work is clearer this year than ever, for it appears that the delay in finishing it has already cost the Government over $20,000 in damages to the southerly breakwater. Why, then, is the appropriation so small? The reason is this: The committee has started out with the assumption that not more than $7,500,000 can properly be appropriated in this bill for all river and harbor works in the country. How they reach that assumption is not clear. The people of this country would willingly pay $15,000,000 a year if they knew that the money was to be spent on important works of river and harbor improvement.

But so long as we follow the present plan the people of the country can not be sure that the money will be so employed. They know, and we know, that when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has fixed the total of the bill, that total must be apportioned among a large number of improvements in order to prevent dissatisfaction among the members of this House. So the total is made small in order to disarm the criticism of the newspapers and the general public; and then it is spread out thin over the whole country in order to disarm the criticism of the several Congressional districts. One result is that, as the committee does not appear to have recognized the exceptional character of the outer breakwater north of Chicago harbor, it goes into the bill as a part of Chicago harbor, and gets the usual percentage allowed to other places, namely, 25 per cent. of the money that the engineers say can be judiciously and economically expended at that place during the next fiscal year.

I intend to move to amend the bill and give to the harbor of Chicago enough to repair the damages made by the storm of December, 1885, to the southerly breakwater, and at the same time to push to a speedy completion the northerly breakwater. If the motion prevails it will be because the Committee of the Whole appreciates the exceptional character of the work and recognizes the importance not only to the owners of lake vessels, but to the United States as an owner of property which it is designed to protect, of having it completed as soon as possible. If my motion fails I shall not blame the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or any member of this House. I shall blame rather the system under which we work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us suppose that we have abandoned the present method of making appropriations for rivers and harbors, and have adopted the other method to which I referred in the opening of my remarks. Suppose we have a board of public works for the lake harbors, and another for the Atlantic coast, and another for the Pacific coast; or suppose that we intrust the duties of such boards to the Secretary of War and his assistants. Suppose we appropriate in a gross sum $15,000,000, to be expended under the authority of the Secretary of War during the next fiscal year. What harm would follow and who could complain? The money would be economically spent on works which the administration regarded as of a national character. The administration has to meet the criticism of the newspaper press of the whole country. It would not be likely to neglect any work of urgent importance, nor would it be likely to spend the money on works which to the general judgment seem to be merely local in their character.

Some places might complain of neglect at first, but my judgment is that the plan would prove so much more satisfactory than the plan under which we are now working that the people of this country would, after a few years, consent to an appropriation of twenty, of even twenty-five millions a year to be spent in the same way. If that result followed we should see the rivers and harbors of this country, the small as well as the great, brought to completion sooner than we can reasonably expect to see them finished under the present system. I do not say that the system proposed would be free from objection. The question is whether, on the whole, it could possibly be as objectionable as the system now prevailing. I do not believe it could. I believe the Committees on Rivers and Harbors in this Congress and in the preceding one have honestly tried to frame the best river and harbor bills possible under the circumstances. I believe that members in Congress do not consciously vote to waste the public money on unimportant projects. What I say is that the detailed scheme of annual expenditure for river and harbor improvements can not be properly made up by a House of Representatives.

The bill is never satisfactory to the general public. It contains appropriations for rivers and harbors with which the general public and the House of Representatives is unfamiliar; and it is certain to be assailed in the press and on the stump as an agglomeration of jobs. It is to meet this anticipated and inevitable criticism that the sum total of the bill is kept as low as possible. Hence public improvements admitted to be national and urgent are starved, in order to keep alive improvements which, however truly national in reality, can not possibly be recognized as such by the general public. I trust the time will soon come when we shall at least try some other system, and thus relieve this House and the public outside of Congress of what is sure to be regarded, so long as it exists, as an enormous annual nuisance.

Mr. Chairman, with the leave of the House, I will cause to be printed in the RECORD the tables from which I have read. They are taken from the report recently forwarded by Major Handbury, engineer in charge, to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-one minutes.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if I should consume the whole of the twenty-one minutes yielded to me by my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] I would not be able to discuss the pending measure with any degree of elaboration or with any sort of satisfaction. I can do little more than barely indicate the objections I have to the bill. I have a multitude of objections to it, but there are at least three general ones, either of which would be sufficient to control my vote against this measure.

I object to it, first, because, at a low estimate, fully 50 per cent. of the water-ways appropriated for are purely local, and in no sense do they possess national importance. So far as appropriations to construct works of internal improvement of real national consequence are concerned, I would be willing to go as far as any one in that direction; and if my voice here could be potential in this class of legislation I would doubtless be considered extravagant in the extent to which I would be disposed to go in improving the real harbors of the country, the great and important harbors, and the chief inland water-ways, such as the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Missouri Rivers.

I agree with much that was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in his speech a few days since, but I disagree with him entirely in his observations either as to the feasibility of improving the Missouri River or as to its importance to the commerce of the country.

I oppose this bill, in the second place, because many of the appropriations in it are for the continuance of works where the balances unexpended now on hand are sufficient, according to the reports of the engineers, to answer all the probable requirements of the next fiscal year.

I am opposed to it, again, upon the ground that if we are to enter into a wholesale policy of improving all water ways without regard to their importance or character, then the discriminations which have been made in this bill in favor of certain sections of the country and against others are unjust to the extent of outrage. I can not elaborate these objections, but I can probably illustrate all of them by reference to one or two of the items in the pending measure.

I call attention, first, to the appropriation to continue the construction of a breakwater at the mouth of Sâco River. There is no port at that point, no town, no harbor; there is nothing at the mouth of Sâco River except—Sâco River and the sea.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will do us the honor to call it Sâco, and then it will be recognized by persons acquainted with geography.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I doubt, sir, whether it would be recognized by anybody by any name, unless by some person who lived in its immediate vicinity; but, Sāco or Sawco—call it by any name you please—the work is one of mere local importance. The object of it is not to make or to improve a harbor; it is to construct a breakwater to protect the mouth of the river by preventing the formation of a sandbar by the drifting in of sands from the sea, which is to be done by increasing the velocity of the currents and thereby, also, deepening the channel.

This work, it is estimated, will cost $356,500. On July 5, 1884, Congress appropriated $15,000 for the work. Two years afterwards, on the 1st day of July, 1886, there remained unexpended of that appropriation a balance of $26.36. In August last this Congress appropriated $12,500 in addition, thus increasing the fund available for the work to $12,526.36, and there is now on hand unexpended exactly that sum. In other words, not one farthing of the money appropriated for that work for this fiscal year has been expended.

Mr. WILLIS. If my friend will pardon me, he is misled by the fact that the bill to which he refers was passed on the 5th of August, after the fiscal year had begun, and therefore the report of the engineer, coming up only to the 30th of June, did not contain an account of the expenditure of the money. I have, however, a later report stating that it has been expended.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I find in Executive Document No. 13, transmitted by the Secretary of War, a statement showing that in November last the balance I have stated was on hand unexpended, and I suppose that no portion of it has been expended since. I understand that the entire appropriation made in August last is now on hand, and if that be true, with this fiscal year, at least so far as the working months of it are concerned, practically expired, only some two or three months remaining, I can see no good reason why there should be any additional appropriation.

Mr. WILLIS. In a letter dated January 6, 1887, from the Chief of Engineers it appears that every dollar appropriated for the Saco River improvement will be expended before the expiration of this fiscal year.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Well, Mr. Chairman, my statement is based upon the letter which was transmitted here by the Secretary of War at the beginning of this session. I know nothing of the letter to which my friend refers. It has not been accessible to those of us who are not members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. We may be able to see it when we come to consider the bill at the close of debate. At all events this work is simply a part of a general scheme to improve that river, and it is so treated by the engineers themselves in their reports which I have before me. In the mean time we are appropriating for the river itself. In this very bill there is an additional appropriation of $3,000 to continue the improvement of the river above the mouth, and there was an appropriation for a similar purpose last year of $12,500. Here, sir, is a river for which we last year appropriated $25,000, and the work on which, according to the estimates, will cost in the neighborhood of half-a-million dollars to complete it. A river upon which such expenditures are made ought to be an important stream. The commerce that has to go down it or up it ought to be of volume sufficient to at least approach national importance. But what is it? What is this river? What is the size of this river? Its entire navigable length is only 5 miles. I desire to read, Mr. Chairman, an extract from the report of the engineers descriptive of this great national water-way:

The head of tide water of Saco River is at the adjoining towns of Saco and Biddeford, and the improvements asked for are below these places.

From the entrance to the river near the shore end of Saco River breakwater up to the wharves at Saco and Biddeford there is a channel of 6 feet depth at mean low water, or about fourteen and a half feet at high water, and of sufficient width, except at the following places marked with the corresponding letters on the accompanying sketch.

Then the engineer gives us six or seven different places, within the length of those 5 miles, where it is absolutely necessary to widen the stream or the channel sufficiently to let a boat pass through its embracing banks. And when he reaches the head of navigation at Saco or Biddeford, two adjoining towns divided by this rivulet, the engineer says:

It will be necessary to remove a shoal consisting of sand and sawdust so as to give a width of 200 feet in order—to enable vessels to turn.

To do what?

Here it is proposed from year to year to make appropriations, which are to aggregate half a million of money, to improve a little stream—a creek 5 miles in length and barely wide enough in many places to admit of the passage of vessels; and when the headwaters of navigation are reached you must dig a hole big enough for boats to right about in order to return.

What commerce is this improvement intended to benefit? The commerce of the towns of Biddeford and Saco alone. And what are they? The town of Biddeford has a population of 12,651; and the town of Saco, 6,389. We are proposing then to expend, in the course of years, at the rate per year of $12,000 and upward, indefinitely, the sum of half a million dollars, to accommodate the commerce of two little towns upon this little creek. Could an appropriation less national in its significance be submitted to this House? I find by referring to the report of the engineer that the principle commerce of these two towns is in coal and cotton. During the year ending August 30, 1884, 33,813 tons of coal and 8,750 bales of cotton were carried to these places by both rail and water; and though the engineer says:

I consider the river worthy of additional improvement in the interest of the business of these towns.

And that—

They are important manufacturing places.

He further says:

But a large proportion of all the goods needed there have come, and will continue to come, by railroad entirely, irrespective of any river improvement.

It seems to me, sir, that a mere statement of the case carries with it a demonstration of the absolute impropriety of this appropriation.

This one case, which is illustrative of many in the bill to which attention will be called in the progress of its consideration, sustains me in the statement I made at the outstart, that I can not support the bill because 50 per cent. of the expenditure proposed is for appropriations somewhat similar to the one I have indicated, and because, in many cases, the balance of appropriations previously made is sufficient to answer the purposes of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman, but will he allow me a question right here?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to know what the gentleman calls an appropriation of "national character." The commerce of the port to which he has just referred goes all over the world.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I suppose that in one sense the commerce of every village in the United States "goes all over the world." But though that may be the fact, I do not admit that insignificant creeks and estuaries are water ways which deserve national recognition. The great harbors of the country, such as Boston, New York, Baltimore, Galveston, and San Francisco, and such great streams inland as the Ohio and the Missouri, sweeping down from the Alleghenies and the Rockies to join their floods with the Mississippi and pour them united through many sovereign States to the sea—those are national works and national streams.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; but does he desire to expend millions on a few great harbors and on a few great rivers that reach through the continent and leave the rest of the country unimproved?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I would improve nothing by national legislation except the important harbors and the important rivers of the country. It may be a little difficult to draw the line and determine just where to begin and where to end; but the improvement, if national, ought to be of waters whose commercial importance at least reaches beyond the confines of a single neighborhood.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to know why the gentleman excepts the great lake cities of this country.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I have not made any exception of the "great lake cities" of the country; nor have I undertaken to name all the cities or ports or harbors that are entitled to receive recognition in this character of legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire now to use the remaining moment of my time to direct attention to the discriminating features of this bill. We see what has been, and is to be, done for Saco River. Through the great State of Missouri, in which I have the honor to reside, flows the Osage River, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, in the nature of things many gentlemen here have not had the time or opportunity to inform themselves as to the character of the improvement of the Mississippi River which is being attempted, as to what has been accomplished, and as to what may reasonably be expected to result from the further prosecution of the work. With those not so informed the violent declarations of those opposing the work may, if not unmasked, pass for argument, and their statements, launched with such prodigal profusion, for facts.

It has occurred to me that under these circumstances a plain, simple statement, outlining briefly the nature of the work and the results obtained, might be of some benefit in this discussion. I shall endeavor to make this statement fairly and accurately.

It may be asserted as axiomatic that it is impossible to improve the Mississippi River except by utilizing its own forces. To successfully do this requires knowledge of its history, its laws, and its methods, only to be obtained by minute, patient, and intelligent observation. The commission have caused to be made a complete topographical, hydrographical, hydrometrical, and geological survey of the river, not to satisfy scientific curiosity, but to enable them to investigate and work understandingly.

If the river could be emptied and its bed exposed to view, we would see an endless succession of deep depressions and large sand-hills. When the channel is filled these depressions constitute the pools, or deep water, and these sand-hills the formidable bars, which in many places seriously obstruct navigation.

Fortunately, most of these bars are so deeply submerged that heavily-laden boats pass over them without difficulty, even during the stage of lowest water.

But others approach within 5 or 6 feet of the surface at this period, and prevent the navigation of the river, except by the smallest craft, to the great cost and detriment of commerce.

Nor does this low stage of water pass away quickly. The report of Hon. E. O. Stannard, of October 30, 1873, to the Senate Committee on Transportation, estimates that for a long period of years there were on an average of fifty-two days when the least depth of water was 6 feet, and sixty-nine days when it was less than 10 feet.

The number of bars below Cairo which obstruct navigation in this way is about forty.

They are usually located in groups, which cover from 20 to 40 miles, and the part of the river occupied by these groups is called a "reach."

There are six of these reaches in the lower river, known as the New Madrid, Plum Point, Memphis, Helena, Choctaw, and Lake Providence Reaches.

To increase the depth on these bars which lie across the pathway of the river, is the improvement which Congress has undertaken to accomplish through the agency of the Mississippi River Commission.

And this involves, of course, such treatment, regulation and control of the river as shall give permanence to the improvement when effected.

To dredge the crest of these bars to the necessary depth is impossible, for the deposition of silt would instantly replace that dredged away. The only means is to enchain and direct the mighty forces of the river itself. It must be borne in mind that these shallow places do not result from an insufficiency of water in the river. If properly distributed along the channel there is always enough water to afford the most abundant depth. In these bad places the river is, like the gentleman from Iowa, a case of misdirected energy and ability.

The first thing to do, therefore, in treating such a reach is to gather up and give suitable direction to these dissipated forces of the river so as to compel it there to build and maintain for itself a suitable and proper channel, as through three-fourths of its length it has done of its own volition.

It is found that wherever the river is narrow it is deep, and wherever it is wide it is shallow. This is because velocity, momentum, and resultant increased depth always accompany concentration.

Another evil, resulting from the diffusion of the river's volume over a large area, is the building up of islands, which divide the channel.

In treating such a place, one of these channels must be closed. In order to close these chutes, as they are called, and to force the water into a narrow channel, new banks must be constructed by artificial means.

These can not be composed of mattresses of brush, laden with stone, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, or of other solid material, for, resting on a bed of alluvion, and constituting an impenetrable bar to the current, it would scour out the bed beneath and speedily destroy them.

The simple but effective plan has been adopted of compelling the river itself to build up the walls which are designed to imprison its forces by interposing obstacles of only sufficient obstructive power to cause it to deposit at the desired spot a portion of the mud, sand, or silt with which its waters are forever laden.

This is accomplished by driving piles in rows across the chute or along the space intended to be filled up. These are interwoven with poles and brush, or mattresses of brush are laid against them. This forms a permeable dam which does not hinder the flow of water entirely, yet sufficiently retards it to cause a rapid deposit of its sediment.

The gentleman from Iowa stated truly that after a few years' exposure these piles decay and break off, but his statement that they must then, and periodically thereafter, be renewed at great cost is wholly incorrect. They are not designed to serve permanently, for when they have caused the required deposit to be made their purpose has been fully effected. Being constrained by these artificial banks to pursue a confined and narrower channel, its forces and energy are enhanced and the river deepens its bed by scouring out its bottom.

To secure permanence for the works of improvement thus described, the caving banks in their neighborhood, and in a few exceptional places, are designed to be fixed and protected from erosion by what is called revetment.

This consists in covering the banks with mattresses of willows which are held in place by riprap of rock.

This revetment does not cost $19 or $20 a linear foot, as asserted by the gentleman from Iowa; on the contrary, the average cost has been about $13 a foot.

Nor do these mattresses have to be renewed as stated by him, because of their decay. Many of the willows composing them soon sprout and grow, and the mattresses become covered with a deposit from the river, which makes them measurably indestructible.

This is the method of doing what is known as channel work. It has received the sanction of two boards of engineers—that appointed in 1879 and that composing the Mississippi River Commission—and, so far as I am informed, of all hydraulic engineers who have bestowed thought upon the subject.

In practice it has accomplished all that its most ardent friends could have wished.

It seems to have been the fate of all great enterprises, in all ages, to be carped at, misrepresented, and maligned, and this national and beneficent work is now passing through the same ordeal.

That it will eventually triumph and put its enemies to shame is certain, unless this great nation shall lose the energy and wisdom which have made it the most conspicuous and admirable on the face of the earth.

In prosecuting the work there have been expended for channel contraction $2,500,000, and for bank protection $2,240,000.

This has been expended on the Plum Point and Lake Providence Reaches, and includes also work done for the protection of the Memphis and Vicksburg Harbors.

The statement of the gentleman from Iowa that $10,000,000 have been expended on the Mississippi River he must know to be incorrect.

The $2,000,000 appropriated at the last session remain wholly unexpended, and the total appropriations prior to that time were $8,000,000.

Of this about $4,740,000 have been expended in channel and revetment work, as already stated. The balance of the appropriations has been expended in purchasing the plant, in repairing levees along the reaches under treatment, in doing work above Cairo, and in maintaining the works during the long periods which, from failure of appropriations, they were constrained to suspend active operations.

Yet that gentleman charged that not 10 per cent. of the appropriation had been so expended.

The Plum Point and Lake Providence Reaches cover about 70 miles of the worst channel, including fourteen chutes and twenty-two bars, upon which at low stages there were often not exceeding 5 feet of water.

There is now a least depth of 13 feet through those reaches, and from having been the worst they are now the very best portions of the river between Saint Louis and New Orleans.

The gentleman from Iowa undertook to weaken this great enterprise by exaggerating the number of boats used in the work.

The nature of the work requires that nearly all of it shall be done from boats, and for operations extending over a distance of 1,500 miles the plant is necessarily extensive.

There are floating pile-drivers operated by a hydraulic jet, snag-boats to draw snags from the banks and bed of the river, hydraulic graders to grade by means of water jets caving banks to the proper slope for revetment, mattress boats carrying steam looms which weave the large mattresses of wire and brush, floating machine and repair shops, boats to accommodate the workmen with board and lodging, and a great number of barges to carry stone, brush, and coal.

I will append to my remarks an itemized statement of this plant.

There is no extravagance in the size of this plant, for the work can not be done without it, and with care the plant will last until it has been entirely completed, even should years be required for that purpose.

The theory upon which operations have been conducted has been fully verified.

The permeable works caused the river to build enormous embankments, the deposits covering many thousands of acres, and untold millions of cubic yards.

In the main, the works of revetment have withstood the tremendous pressure upon them, securing not only bank stability, but fixity of channel, and with the experience acquired such work in the future will be done more cheaply and effectively. The river has been coerced into good behavior, and the result is a splendid channel for the purposes of navigation.

Those navigating the river recognize the signal success of the efforts made for its amelioration, and anxiously await further relief from the Government.

There is another means proposed to be applied in connection with revetment and channel work, for the rectification and control of the river, which seems, more than anything else, to excite the hostility and wrath of those who are the enemies of the enterprise.

I allude to the confinement of the waters during times of floods by embankments of earth, called levees, thrown up in more or less proximity to the banks.

Notwithstanding the fact that the idea of improving navigation by such means had its origin with eminent engineers, who have no personal interest whatsoever in the protection of the adjacent lands from overflow, and that it is strenuously urged and supported by them, upon what appear to be incontrovertible scientific principles, gentlemen persist in arguing the question as though the inhabitants of the valley were demanding that the Government enter upon levee building upon a large scale, for the sole purpose of warding off the destructive floods which at times pour along that valley on their way to the Gulf. And when the representatives of these inhabitants protest that this is not true, and that they simply wish that the engineers in charge of the work shall be allowed to prosecute it in their own way, they are discourteously and without warrant denounced as mouthers of false pretenses.

By such methods it is attempted to excite distrust and prejudice, and thus accomplish what could not be won upon the field of fair argument and discussion. The inhabitants of the valley at no time since this work was inaugurated have asked for money to be expended in constructing levees. This bill makes no provision of that kind, and Congress has never appropriated money for that purpose. We have only asked, and now only ask, that the commission may build levees, if in their judgment they will aid in improving navigation and facilitating commerce. The commission are not required, but simply authorized to build them.

If gentlemen knew anything about this matter of levees, which they assume to discuss so flippantly, they would know that the residents of the valley, if their sole purpose was to protect their property from the ravages of the floods, would seek to have the appropriation expended in protecting the banks from caving by revetment.

So long as the banks cave badly, so long must levees be rebuilt from time to time. It is this perpetual drain upon the resources of the people to rebuild their levees which makes protection from overflow so expensive and burdensome. If the caving could be stopped they could and would of their own means construct levees which would be capable of resisting any flood, and which would endure forever.

If, therefore, the dwellers in the valley were actuated by such an unwarrantable purpose as that attributed to them, they would seek to have their banks protected by revetment, which would give permanent relief, rather than to have levees built, which, under existing conditions, must be more or less wanting in the element of permanency.

The fact is, they have been as self-reliant since this commission was organized as before, and that means to say that they are now, as they have been for years, using every means within their power, by taxation and otherwise, to combat this great river, without pausing for one moment to inquire whether or not the Government would aid them. Speaking more particularly, because better informed, with reference to the district which I have the honor to represent, I will say that the upper half, embracing five counties, which heretofore was not so well protected, has within the past two years raised $900,000 for levee purposes by issuing its negotiable bonds.

So great is the confidence reposed in the ability and willingness of the property owners to raise money for this purpose by taxation, that these bonds were readily disposed of in New York at par. The lower half of the district has had and maintained a levee system for a long period, and during the past twelve months expended $90,000. To-day, along the whole Yazoo front, there is a continuous line of levees which absolutely protected the district from the unusually high floods of 1886.

Confidence in the ability and determination of the residents of the district to grapple successfully with the floods, has also led to the immigration within the last few months of not less than ten thousand persons seeking to better their fortunes through the wonderful and exhaustless fertility of its lands.

Railroads have also come, and other lines have been projected and will shortly be constructed.

There are, in round numbers, five millions of acres in that district; and now, that the question of protection from overflow is practically settled, it will be rapidly populated and brought into cultivation, and the time will come, and that at no very distant day, when it will contribute not less than two millions of bales of cotton to enrich and enlarge the commerce of the country. In the name of these brave and heroic people I protest against the imputation of the gentleman from Iowa. His charge is unjust, cruel, and without the slightest foundation in fact.

The theory that levees will contribute to the amelioration of the condition of the river is not only maintainable in argument but may be demonstrated by established facts.

Bad navigation is caused by bars. If there were no bars, there would be no trouble with the channel. It follows, therefore, that anything which tends to remove existing bars, or to prevent the formation of new ones, aids directly in the improvement of the channel.

An increment to existing bars accompanies the floods, for the obvious reason that in the wide shallow places where they are found there is greater area and less velocity, and consequently a deposition of silt. The average slope of the river is about one-third of a foot to the mile, while the banks slope away from the river 4 to 10 feet to the mile.

When an overflow comes it is apparent that this great slope from the banks will draw the water away from the channel with great velocity. By this means the surface slope and along with it the direction of the thread of the stream is turned, involving loss of continuity of motion and reduction of velocity. This in turn causes a rapid deposition of silt, which increases the size of existing bars and creates new ones.

At Malone's Landing, Riverton, Bolivar, and Mound Landing crevasses occurred during the flood of 1882. Surveys made before and after they occurred showed that they had produced an average filling up of the entire channel space of 13 per cent. The closure of the Bonnet Carre crevasse, near New Orleans, showed an immediate increase of channel space of about 12 per cent.

Prior to the war about two hundred miles of Red River above Alexandria were completely leveed, and the channel was thereby so deepened and enlarged that the floods were discharged within its banks and scarcely reached the levees. In those sections where there were no levees the shallow channel continued to cause overflows. So in the upper portion of the Lafourche, a bayou heading in the Mississippi at Donaldsonville, where levees have been maintained for years, the depth is unimpaired, while in the lower portion, which is not leveed, the bed is seriously obstructed by sediment.

During the flood of 1882 many crevasses occurred which admitted the water freely into the Yazoo basin. The maximum stage at Cairo was 51 feet, and at Vicksburg 48 feet. These crevasses were closed before the flood of 1883 came, and the effect upon the river was so marked that while the maximum stage was the same at Cairo as in 1882, at Vicksburg it was only 43 feet, or 5 feet lower.

It is thus manifest, both by theory and fact, that the confinement of high-water floods by levees is largely promotive of the efforts of the commission to improve the navigation of the river.

Mr. Stannard, of Saint Louis, estimated that $28,000,000 would be saved annually in the cost of transportation alone if a suitable channel could be maintained; and the Board of Engineers, which examined the question in 1879, said that if this were true the work should be done if it cost $70,000,000.

In 1885 General Gillmore said:

> There seems to be no just ground for apprehension that the ultimate cost of this improvement will be inordinately great, or will exceed what the Government will be fully justified in expending upon a great national work, in the success of which so large and so varied interests are involved.

Judging the question by what has been accomplished, I would say that $30,000,000 would be a large estimate. The commission has been most recklessly and needlessly assailed. It is composed of able and faithful men, who have given the work great attention, and whose achievements, notwithstanding what has been stated to the contrary, have been signally successful and fully justify the confidence expressed by them.

The statement repeatedly made on this floor that they contemplated reveting the banks of the river on both sides from Cairo to the Gulf, at a cost of probably $150,000,000, is not justified by anything ever said or done by them. It is certain that they have never considered such a project. So the averment that everything done by them has been purely experimental, and that it can not yet be told whether their plans can be carried into effect, is directly opposed to the evidences placed by them before us. They are entitled to the confidence and respect of the country, and what they have said is entitled to far more consideration than the groundless assertions annually so vociferously declaimed here by the enemies of the enterprise.

If the river is worthy of improvement, the work should remain in their hands. By experience, acquired through long years of careful study of the conditions of the river, the problems involved, and the means to be used in their solution, they are far better qualified to carry it to a successful conclusion than new and untried men would be.

To strike them down is but part of the plan to strike down the whole enterprise, and I appeal to the friends of the river to turn a deaf ear to these insidious proposals, and hold up the hands of these able, impartial, and faithful public servants. If the plan being pursued is discarded, the whole work must be abandoned, for nothing is proposed in its stead.

Is this House prepared to say that these engineers are imbecile, or what is worse, that they have acted and spoken insincerely or with duplicity, and that all efforts to restrain, control, and direct the energies of this greatest and most useful of rivers shall be abandoned? That is the real issue which its adversaries seek to present, disguise it as they may. If we are reasonable men we will be governed by the opinions of the scientific workmen who have it in charge rather than the clamor of those who strive to make reckless assertion obscure and overwhelm legitimate examination and argument.

This great river has 15,000 miles of tributaries, and carries off the surplus waters of eighteen States. It fully justifies the important place assigned it by our distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Daniel Manning, of New York, who, in his last annual report, in discussing the surplus taxation problem, said:

> I also set aside as equally indefensible the continuance of our present surplus taxation and its employment in extravagant appropriations, by which, of course, I neither mean to include suitable annual appropriations for the large expense of deepening the channel to carry off the floods of the Mississippi River, nor such as are needed for the still larger expense of providing our seaboard cities with a permanent coast defense.
> These are not the means of naval aggression nor incitements to militancy at home or abroad; they are prudent provisions "for the common defense and general welfare," which requires no blanket clause to justify or cover them. Our engineers do not need extravagant appropriations to carry on as fast as practicable these great works, which should be the labor and the legacy of a peaceful generation for the benefit of those who will succeed to our inheritance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for general debate on the pending bill, by order of the House, has expired, and the bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named:

Improving harbor at Rockland, Me.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want that paragraph to be passed, but to remain before the House, as I have an amendment to move to it.

Mr. WILLIS. In view of that statement I ask that the amendment be offered now, as it may be something we can accept.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; it is a fundamental one.

The CHAIRMAN. This paragraph will be before the committee when it next resumes the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will offer his amendment, so we may be able to know what it is.

Mr. HEPBURN. I prefer to have the paragraph pending. The amendment is in the hands of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] at the present time.

Mr. WILLIS. I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. MILLS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RHODE ISLAND CONTESTED ELECTION CASE.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that on Monday or Tuesday next I will call up for consideration the Rhode Island contested-election case of PAGE against PIRCE.

GRADES—ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10804) to effect a re-arrangement of grades of the officers in the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISER NEWARK.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer as a matter of great public importance the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read; and I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to readvertise for bids for the construction of cruiser No. 1, known as the Newark, and to contract for such construction for any amount, which, together with the cost of equipment (exclusive of armament), shall not exceed $1,300,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I should like to know why that resolution is presented at this time.

Mr. NORWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Maine this refers to the construction of one of the cruisers authorized by the last Congress.

Mr. REED. But why is it presented in so empty a House?

Mr. NORWOOD. I have been trying to get opportunity for days to present it. The amount authorized by Congess was $1,100,000, but the lowest bid received was in excess of that amount. The Secretary of the Navy in his letter asks authority of Congress to readvertise for bids, the amount not to exceed $1,300,000, or $200,000 more than the present limit.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Wherein do the bids proposed to be offered differ from the bids that have been offered. I mean not the amounts of the bids, but the things which they cover.

Mr. NORWOOD. The letter of the Secretary of the Navy states exactly what is desired, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me we ought not to proceed at this late hour to the consideration of this resolution, and therefore I move the House adjourn.

Mr. NORWOOD. I have no objection to that, if the resolution be pending.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution be passed in its present form it will not accomplish the purpose of the gentleman from Georgia, as the House of Representatives alone would not have the authority asked for. It should be a joint resolution.

Mr. REED. Let it be taken up when somebody is present.

Mr. NORWOOD. I ask the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 15, 1886.

SIR: The appropriation act approved March 3, 1885, authorized, among other things, the construction of "two cruisers of not less than 5,000 tons displacement, costing, exclusive of armament, not more than $1,100,000 each."

In pursuance of this authority, plans were prepared by the Department of two cruisers, one upon a contemplated tonnage displacement of 3,700 tons and the other of 4,000 tons.

Upon the 4,000-ton vessel the bids received were as follows:

Cruiser No. 1 (Newark).

The Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, iron-steamship builders, Wilmington, Del. (the hull to be constructed according to the Department's plans and specifications; machinery according to contractor's plans)	$1,224,900
The William Cramp & Son's Ship and Engine Building Company, Philadelphia Pa. (hull to be constructed according to the Department's plans and specifications; machinery to be constructed on contractor's plans and specifications)	1,198,000
The Union Iron Works, iron-steamship builders, San Francisco, (hull and machinery to be constructed according to the Department's plans and specifications)	1,132,000

All these bids being in excess of the limit fixed by the act.

I submit this matter to the committee in the hope that such action may be taken as will enable the Department to readvertise the vessel with the limit raised to $1,300,000, and utilize the plans already prepared.

To reduce the size of the vessel to a point likely to bring the bids within the present limit would require many months, and in fact the designing of a new ship.

Thirteen hundred thousand dollars is suggested, for the reason that in addition to the bid the equipment of the vessel must be provided, and this sum mentioned is not, therefore, too large.

Very respectfully,

W. C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. H. A. HERBERT, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLS's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOUTELLE: Petition of B. M. Pike, A. W. Lamson, and others, fishermen of Lubec, Me., for increase of duty on smoked herring to 1 cent per pound—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of Calvin W. Reynolds and 100 others, citizens of Lewisville, Ind., asking that a pension be granted to Mollie Llewellen, wife of Francis M. Llewellen, of Company D, Ninety-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COMSTOCK: Resolution of the Michigan State Agricultural Society, asking for the passage of the Miller bill, so-called—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, joint resolution of the Michigan Legislature, requesting the passage of the Miller bill, so-called—to the same committee.

By Mr. DUNHAM: Petition of Peter Van Schaack & Sons, of Chicago, Ill., favoring repeal of internal-revenue taxes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FREDERICK: Petition of Thomas B. Wales and others, citizens of Johnson County, Iowa, asking for the passage of the bill for the extermination of the cattle disease known as pleuro-pneumonia—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. FUNSTON: Petition of V. R. E. Ellis and others, of Gardner, Kans., for the passage of the pleuro-pneumonia bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. GROUT: Petition of H. F. Barber and 51 others, citizens of Wilmington, Vt., praying for the repeal of the act limiting arrears of pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAMMOND: Papers relating to the claim of Joseph Honsby, of Campbell County, of Andrew P. McCool, of Fulton County, and of James Waters, of Henry County, Georgia—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HARRIS: Papers relating to the claim of Mary E. Handaway, of Muscogee County, Georgia—to the same committee.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Petition of the Pastors' Alliance, of the District of Columbia, in favor of Congressional action providing for gathering statistics on the subject of marriages and divorces—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HOLMES: Petition of Thomas B. Wales and 7 others, citizens of Iowa, a committee of the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States, praying for the passage of the pleuro-pneumonia bill—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. JAMES: Petition of Conrad Broker, jr., and 43 others, merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics, of New York, asking for the repeal of internal-revenue taxes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLEY: Petition of 75 citizens of Bristol, Bucks County, of 83 citizens of Philadelphia, and of 3 manufacturers of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of internal-taxes—to the same committee.

By Mr. KLEINER: Petition of the Posey County (Indiana) Cattle-Breeders' Association, praying for the passage of the Miller bill—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition of V. M. Metcalf, in behalf of the bill (H. R. 2933) known as the Hatch bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. O'FERRALL: Petition of A. T. Bibb, John L. Cochran, and 11 others, citizens of Albemarle County, Virginia, for the passage of the experiment-station bill—to the same committee.

Also, petition of George Chrisman and 300 others, citizens of Rockingham County, Virginia, for legislation to protect the county against pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among cattle—to the same committee.

By Mr. OWEN: Petition from Capt. William Watts, for a harbor of refuge at Wolf Lake, Lake County, Indiana, on the border of Lake Michigan—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RICE: Petition of John N. Berry, of Worcester, Mass., in favor of proportional representation, and the abolition of the United States Senate—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: Petition of J. G. Willis, administrator of John T. Crockett, deceased, asking to refer his case to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RYAN: Petition of Melvern Post, No. 238, of Potwin Post, No. 377, and of Silver Lake Post, No. 207, Grand Army of the Republic, of Kansas, favoring the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SENEY: Joint resolution of the Ohio Legislature, favoring the bill (H. R. 2776) for the adjustment of accounts between the United States and the several States—to the same committee.

By Mr. CHARLES STEWART: Petition of sundry citizens of Chambers County, Texas, asking that an appropriation be made for Old River, in said county—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. STORM: Memorial of Pomona Grange, of Columbia County, Pennsylvania, against placing wool on the free list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of P. R. Daniel, of Franklin County, Alabama, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petitions, praying for the enactment of a bill providing temporary aid for common schools, to be disbursed on the basis of illiteracy, were severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Of 157 citizens of the eighth district of Massachusetts.

By Mr. CASWELL: Of 186 citizens of the first district of Wisconsin.

By Mr. FLEEGER: Of 356 citizens of the twenty-sixth district of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. HOLMES: Of 167 citizens of the tenth district of Iowa.

By Mr. MURPHY: Of 504 citizens of the second district of Iowa.

By Mr. SESSIONS: Of citizens of Allegany, Cattaraugus, and Chautauqua Counties, New York.

By Mr. MILO WHITE: Of 211 citizens of the first district of Minnesota.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 24, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented the credentials of CHARLES B. FARWELL, chosen by the Legislature of Illinois a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of JOHN A. LOGAN, deceased, in the term ending March 3, 1891; which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented the credentials of CUSHMAN KELLOGG DAVIS, chosen by the Legislature of Minnesota a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1887; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation of $15,400 for the construction of two elevators in the new Pension Office building; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State submitting the draught of an appropriation of $4,000 to enable the United States to be represented in the fourth conference of the Red Cross Association, to be held at Baden, September 19, 1887; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a statement of employés detailed for duty in his office from subordinate bureaus, and asking that they be provided for in the legislative, &c., appropriation bill for the ensuing fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, in favor of the passage of the bill to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia as set forth in House bill 2776; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure the passage of a law "to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia," as set forth in House bill 2776, and dated January 7, 1886.

Whereas, on January 7, 1886, Hon. W. T. PRICE, of Wisconsin, introduced, in the House, House bill 2776, which was referred to the House Committee on Judiciary; and on May 24, 1886, Hon. WADE HAMPTON, of South Carolina, introduced in the Senate an amendment to Senate bill 2457, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, "A bill to adjust certain accounts between the United States and Territories and the District of Columbia."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States, and the District of Columbia, a sum equal to all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto, with such additional credits as under said act they are entitled to have, in consequence of having paid any portion thereof without expense of collection to the United States; and such sums also as have been collected from lands or owners thereof under supplemental acts on any account whatever.

"SEC. 2. That all moneys still due to the United States on the quota of direct tax apportioned by section 8 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, are hereby remitted and relinquished.

"SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, for all money found due to them under the provisions of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay the same: Provided, That when the same, or any part thereof, credited to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, has been collected from any citizen thereof, either directly or by sale, resale, or lease of property, such sum shall be held in trust by such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the benefit of those of its citizens from whom it was collected, or their legal representatives;"

Whereas the foregoing bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall credit each State with the amount of money assessed against it for direct taxes under the act of August 5, 1861;

Whereas the effect of the passage, by Congress, of said bill will be to refund to those States which have paid the amounts of such assessments to the extent of the sums by them so paid, and to release those States which have not paid from hereafter paying all said taxes, and also from all future liability to pay the same. Whilst the right of the General Government to raise revenue by direct taxation is unquestioned, it is patent that this direct tax was in the nature of an enforced loan, and it was made in this form only because it was required to meet the great exigency then upon the country; and,

Whereas several of the States now owe the General Government from a quarter to a half million dollars each, on account of this direct tax, while others have paid their full quota: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill hereinbefore referred to, and use their best endeavors to secure to the State the amount paid to the United States by this forced tax.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives by the governor of Ohio.

JOHN C. ENTREKIN,
Speaker of the house of representatives.
ROB'T P. KENNEDY,
President of the senate.

Adopted January 19, 1887.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

OHIO, Office of the secretary of state:

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of house joint resolution No. 68, adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the 19th day of January, A. D. 1887, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 19th day of January, A. D. 1887.

JAMES S. ROBINSON,
Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, COLUMBUS, OHIO, January 18, 1887.

In accordance with the provisions of the foregoing resolutions, the same are hereby respectfully transmitted.

J. B. FORAKER, Governor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the New Mexico Bar Association, praying for the passage of some law to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the Territory of New Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota to the Congress of the United States, in favor of the passage of what is known as the Dawes bill, which provides for opening a portion of the Sioux Indian Reservation in Dakota; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the council and house of representatives of the Territory of Idaho, praying that so much of the land in the reservation of the Shoshone and Bannock Indians as is not actually required for the use of those Indians be restored to the public domain and opened for settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Hannah Phillips, of Velpen, Ind., praying to be allowed a widow's pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of residents of the fourteenth Congressional district of Ohio, praying for certain legislation in regard to the heirs of Thomas Delânell and others; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the Maine State Grange, representing more than 15,000 farmers in the State, remonstrating against the extension of a patent as provided in the bill (S. 2813) entitled:

A bill for the relief of David L. Garver; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of Cross Post, No. 78, Grand Army of the Republic, of Seneca Falls, N. Y., praying for the passage of the anti-Mormon bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Robert Irwin, of New York; the petition of Harriett Hoffman, of Lansingburg, N. Y.; the petition of Nelson Kaien, of Saranac, N. Y.; and the petition of Mrs. Mary Figsby, of New York, praying the extension of time for filing applications for arrears of pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Vessel-owners and Captains' National Association, of New York, praying for the passage of the bill relieving vessels from compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Highland Falls, N. Y., praying for the passage of the bill increasing the pensions of those who have lost both arms in the military or naval service of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented six memorials of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the repeal or modification of the oleomargarine law; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petition of J. F. Henry & Co., of New York city; a petition of citizens of Clinton County, New York; a petition of wholesale druggists of Syracuse, N. Y.; a petition of 45 citizens and business men of New York; the petition of James Harrison, treasurer of the Orange County (New York) Woolen Mills; a petition of citizens of Buffalo, N. Y.; a petition of the secretary of the Saxony Woolen Mills of New York; and a petition of John H. Francis, of New York, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Harmony Farmers' Club, of Chautauqua County, New York, favoring the passage of an amendment of the patent laws so that the user of a patented article may not be liable for using an infringement; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. COLQUITT presented a petition of citizens of Athens, Ga., praying for a modification of the internal-revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BERRY. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Helena, Ark., showing that the special-license tax imposed by the oleomargarine bill upon wholesale and retail dealers is an unjust and inequitable tax upon all persons of limited means, and they ask that the law imposing the tax be repealed. I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition signed by all the national banks of the city of Chicago, Ill., recommending certain modifications and changes in House bill 9110, now pending before the Committee on Finance; also a like petition of all the national banks in the city of Saint Paul; and also a like petition from all the national banks in the city of Minneapolis, Minn. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a memorial of the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce, of Washington Territory, remonstrating against the passage of the interstate-commerce bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STANFORD presented a petition of officers of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of California, praying for the passage of the bill submitting to the people of the District of Columbia the question of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER presented a resolution of the house of representatives of the Legislature of Colorado, favoring an appropriation for a public building and signal station at Pueblo, Colo.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of 68 men and 25 women, citizens of Milford, Nebr., praying for an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. PLATT. I present the memorial of E. Rockwell and 822 others, remonstrating against the removal of the custom-house from Middletown to Hartford in the State of Connecticut. I presented the other day the remonstrance of 350 citizens of that district, making in all about 1,200. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce. It is not usual to refer remonstrances under such circumstances to a committee, but as these parties will desire a hearing, I ask that the memorial I now present, together with the one on the table, be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I do not desire to recommit the bill because that might lead to embarrassment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both memorials will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOM presented a joint resolution adopted by the Thirty-fifth General Assembly of Illinois favoring the passage of the so-called invalid pension bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOWEN presented the petition of E. W. Hunt and others, of San Juan County, Colorado, praying for the passage of an amendment to section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented the petition of Green Arnold, of Oregon, praying compensation for damages sustained by Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of the executive committee of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars, State of Oregon, representing 4,000 members of that order, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1579) granting the people of the District of Columbia the right to determine by ballot whether intoxicating liquors may be legally manufactured and sold in the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of certain gas consumers, citizens of Washington, D. C., praying legislation for cheapening the price of gas for light and fuel; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Upton (Massachusetts) Grange and Farmers' Club, praying for the passage of the Hatch experiment-station bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present resolutions of the Albuquerque Board of Trade of New Mexico, setting forth the uncertainty of title to the lands in that Territory, representing that it is of the most vital importance to the Territory that some Congressional action should be speedily had which will relieve the present distressing state of affairs, and indorsing the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Antonio Joseph, the Delegate from that Territory, which was passed by the House, believing that it is calculated to settle the titles. At the same time they urge that if that bill cannot be passed, then any other proposed legislation which may be more agreeable to Congress and which will clear the titles to the land in that Territory by any means short of confiscation will be preferable to the present state of affairs. They therefore urge that Congress at this session shall take some action for the purpose of adjusting those land claims.

I believe the bill has already been reported, and I ask that the resolutions be received and laid on the table, hoping that speedy action will be taken upon the bill. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], as well as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who are members of the Committee on Private Land Claims, to this subject.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that the Senator from North Carolina reported not the bill which the Senator desires to have passed, but another one.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand he reported the bill which has heretofore passed the Senate as a substitute for the House bill, striking out the House bill and inserting. The people of New Mexico want legislation which will settle these titles, and if they cannot get the Antonio Joseph bill, they want some other one that will settle the titles, and at the same time not confiscate their property.

Mr. PLUMB. Perhaps the Senate bill will settle the titles and settle them at the same time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I differ with the Senator about that.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kansas have stated with entire correctness that the bill was reported to the Senate at the last session. The bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was reported as a substitute for the House bill and is now on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of P. M. Neal and others, of Lynn, Mass., praying for the enactment of an international arbitration act; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Joseph W. Greene and others, of Easthampton, Mass., praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1982) for the relief of Charles Murphy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3068) for the relief of certain settlers upon the school lands of Washington Territory, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2410) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2068) for the relief of William H. Simmons, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3144) for the relief of James Taylor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that change of reference is made I should like my friend from Kansas to state what is the subject.

Mr. PLUMB. The subject of it is the transfer of some lands in the State of North Carolina to the United States. They are not public lands in any sense, as I understand, and consequently the Committee on Public Lands thought they had no jurisdiction over the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Committee on Public Lands will be discharged, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3055) for the extension and repair of the public buildings of Newark, N. J., reported it without amendment.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8923) to amend an act in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, to report it without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration. It will take no time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 7 of the general statutes of the United States, chapter 190, approved June 10, 1880, being "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes" (Stats. at Large, vol. 21, p. 174), be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting in line 4 of said section 7, after the word "Middletown," the word "Bridgeport;" so that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable goods extended by said act to certain cities therein named shall be also extended to said Bridgeport, Conn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a phrase there which needs amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] will explain the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may go on, subject to objection, until I look at it for a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. McMILLAN. This may go on, subject to objection.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Vermont does not object, I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All I wish to call attention to is that the phraseology of the bill opens with "section 7 general statutes of the United States." There are not any such statutes of the United States. Then it proceeds properly to refer later on to "Statutes at Large, volume 21, page 174." I do not know whether the phrase "general statutes" there means "the Revised Statutes." If it does it ought to say so. If not, it ought to indicate the law of the United States referred to and not make use of that phrase, which is entirely misleading, for nobody knows what it means.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator think that the bill should be amended?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be, to be at all proper.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the Senator think it will accomplish its object as it now is?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is in the usual form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is a House bill, and it would be necessary to send it back to the other House if an amendment were made.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 306) granting a pension to George Schneider;
A bill (H. R. 4535) granting a pension to Adelisa Perry;
A bill (H R. 4745) granting a pension to William S. Bewley;
A bill (H. R. 6027) granting a pension to William McFadden;
A bill (H. R. 7732) for the relief of Franz Rossrucker;
A bill (H. R. 8463) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. J. Meagher;
A bill (H. R. 8720) granting a pension to William B. Eve;
A bill (H. R. 8818) granting a pension to Frederick Dierking;
A bill (H. R. 9401) granting an increase of pension to H. H. Dodd;
A bill (H. R. 10025) granting a pension to Clementine Hartinger;
A bill H. R. 10082) to increase the pension of Margaret R. Jones;
A bill (H. R. 10093) for the relief of Elizabeth Glassbrener and Mary Glassbrener;
A bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to Minerva Abbey; and
A bill (H. R. 10104) granting a pension to Caroline L. Shedd.

The above fourteen bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3192) to remove the charge of desertion against Alfred G. Romine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3193) for the relief of Warren Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 3194) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles D. Bradley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 3195) granting a pension to Sarah E. Beeman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referrred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3196) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Richard H. Keith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3197) granting a pension to Ludwig Sommerfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3198) to provide for the construction of a steam cruising vessel of war of 20 knots speed; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 3199) to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon (by request), introduced a bill (S. 3200) authorizing the city of Pomeroy, in Washington Territory, to levy and collect special taxes for the purpose of securing a water supply for said city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3201) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James Kilpatrick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 3202) to amend section 1121 of the Revised Statutes relating to the appointment of chaplains; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (S. 3203) to define the routes of steam-railroads in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3204) to regulate the construction of street-railroads and of the pavements between and adjacent thereto within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3205) to regulate the erection and operation of elevators within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 3206) to regulate the subdivisions of land within the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO A BILL.

Mr. BOWEN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3184) granting the Utah Midland Railway Company the right of way through the Uncompahgre and Unitah reservations in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

LAWS RELATING TO BRIDGES.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed the usual number of copies of "a compilation of the laws of the United States relating to the construction of bridges over the navigable waters," including the laws of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress; and that there be printed, in addition to the usual number, 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; said compilation to be printed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

RIVER AND HARBOR ACTS.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed the usual number of copies of "a compilation of the laws of the United States relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors," including the laws of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress; and that there be printed, in addition to said usual number, 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; said compilation to be printed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

ADDITIONAL CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. McMILLAN. On a previous day of the session a resolution was passed directing the Committee on Commerce to prepare a report in regard to the river and harbor bill when it shall have been acted upon by the committee. In pursuance of that resolution I now offer a resoluton which I ask may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be an additional clerk for the Committee on Commerce for the remainder of the session, at a salary of $8 per day; and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the said salary out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is similar to the resolution which was passed at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALL. I call up the resolution which was before the Senate for discussion last Friday, and ask for a vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 3128) concerning post-offices of the third class. It is a short bill, and I do not think it will excite any discussion. It is desired that it shall be passed in order to prevent what the Department calls the see-sawing of post-offices from one class to another. A very brief explanation is all that will be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him instructing the Attorney-General to bring suit for an injunction against the Florida Railway and Navigation Company.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Florida to yield to me for a few minutes so as to dispose of this bill, if I can get consent to take it up.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection if it will not take any discussion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will not, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion of the Senator from Florida, the Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3128) concerning post-offices of the third class.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I gave notice on Friday that I would immediately after the morning business this morning ask the Senate to consider the fisheries bill, which was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and if this is to take up any time——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will not consume any time, I think. If it should indicate that, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the request of the Senator from Iowa upon this occasion, but I do want to say that if we would devote what remains of the morning hour until 2 o'clock to the Calendar under Rule VIII we might in a very short time go through the Calendar and all of us would have an equal chance to have our matters considered. After this morning, so far as one objection will go, I shall object to taking any bill up out of its order during that hour, and if I can defeat its being taken up by voting against it I give notice that I shall do both from this time on until we have an opportunity to go through the Calendar under Rule VIII.

THIRD-CLASS POST-OFFICES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3128) concerning post-offices of the third class.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that no post-office of the third class shall be changed into the fourth class if it appears by the returns of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department that the gross receipts of such office amount for the year to $1,900, or that the box-rents and commissions constituting the postmaster's compensation amount to $1,000 or more for the year.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In explanation of the bill, I will read a paragraph from the last report of the Postmaster-General. He says:

> The statute prescribing when a fourth-class office shall become Presidential requires an additional modifying condition, in order to prevent what may be termed the see-sawing of an office between the two classes. As it now stands the Auditor must report, and the Department assign to the third class, some offices during a fiscal year which at the end of it must be relegated to the fourth class; with liability to a renewal of the transmigration in the following year. As a new appointment is legally necessary at each such change, requiring once confirmation by the Senate, and involving each time a new bond by the postmaster, the inconvenience then becomes vexatious. Two such cases happened during the last year. The difficulty arises because the box-rents and commissions to a fourth-class postmaster will often yield him over $250 per quarter during the year, although his gross receipts do not sum up $1,900 for the year; and the office cannot remain in the third class, under the statute, unless the latter be also the case.
> The insertion in the first proviso of the second section of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Statutes, 602) of an additional condition upon the Auditor's reporting a case, to the effect that the returns shall show gross receipts for the four preceding quarters of $1,900 or more, would apparently relieve the defect in the law. Nor would it impair the postmaster's income, because the Auditor must continue to allow him in the case supposed the same compensation while such an office remains in the fourth class, which would be fixed as his salary upon declaring the office Presidential.

With that explanation I am willing to take the sense of the Senate upon the bill. It seems to me entirely proper and necessary in order to avoid the difficulty pointed out by the Postmaster-General.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him instructing the Attorney-General to bring suit for an injunction against the Florida Railway and Navigation Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is so near 1 o'clock that I do not know but that the Senator will be willing to allow us to have unanimous consent to go on with the fisheries bill now.

Mr. CALL. I shall occupy but a very few moments. I merely want a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon referring the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I hope that reference will not be made. I believe there is no objection on the part of any member of the committee except the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the passage of the resolution as it is amended, and I hope there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe I have the floor on the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I would very much prefer, inasmuch as the Senator from Vermont has suggested his desire to bring up the fisheries bill, which is a matter of great public importance, that this question should go over until to-morrow; but I will proceed with it, if the Senator from Florida insists on occupping the next fifteen minutes in considering the matter.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Alabama proposes to speak until the morning hour expires, and not let us have a vote upon the resolution, I will allow it to go over until to-morrow morning in the morning hour; though it is very important, and I think it is only fair to me that a vote should be taken upon it. However, I have no power, of course, over it, and if he proposes to occupy the floor, I shall allow it to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not speak on the resolution, when it comes up properly, a moment longer than is necessary to place the Senate in possession of the facts in regard to it which I consider to be important. I have no desire to delay it at all; not the slightest; on the contrary, rather to facilitate action upon it; but I do not think that I could state what is incumbent on me, as to the facts in regard to the resolution prior to its passage, under fifteen minutes.

Mr. CALL. Then I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Florida retains its place on the Calendar, subject to a motion at any time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9854) to remove the political disabilities of S. Barron, of Virginia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert; and

A bill (S. 2301) granting a pension to Lucy E. Anderson.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 2220) granting a pension to James G. Mathes;

A bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the heirs of Malitty Rose;

A bill (S. 2369) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Price;

A bill (S. 2721) to remove the political disabilities of John K. Mitchell; and

A bill (S. 2848) for the relief of Benjamin P. Loyall, of the State of Virginia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon;

A bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.; and

A bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3173) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, if he think proper, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont which has just occurred to me on reading this bill.

In line 41 are the words "and also, if he think proper." Of course the President would not make use of that next clause if he did not think proper, but the language seems to me to suggest that it might be the last resort of the President, when, in my judgment, that provision will be the first resort, and probably the only one under present circumstances; that is, to forbid the entry of fish of any kind from Canada into the United States. I ask the Senator if he has any objection to striking out the words "if he think proper."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not the least. The bill means exactly the same without those words. The whole thing is left to the President's discretion in the contingency named.

Mr. FRYE. I see it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And to apply his denial of entry, &c., to any one or all of the parts of these various categories. The meaning would be precisely the same whether that phrase is in or out.

Mr. FRYE. Then I move to strike out the words "if he think proper" in line 41.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In lines 20 and 21 of this bill, and also in lines 29 and 30, after speaking of the privilege of entering port, "privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews of the most favored nation," the phrase is added "or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof." It seems to me that phraseology is a little vague. The description is unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the privileges of entering, and so forth. In saying that it is a little vague, and I must admit that it is as explicit as the nature of the case will admit, I do not mean to criticise the skill with which the bill is drawn; but it has occurred to me that it might be well to add after the word "thereof" in line 21, and also after the same word in line 30, this phrase:

Or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof.

So that you are not going to attribute a particular motive. If the legal authorities of the place are in the habit of an unjust vexation or harassing of our vessels, we are not bound to say what particular motive they may have in mind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This phraseology was adopted after a careful study by the committee of the precise situation, and was intended to apply, and the committee thinks it does apply, just as it stands now, to the very condition of things to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers. The privilege of entering by American fishing vessels into the ports of the British Dominions of North America for certain purposes is secured by treaty. The privilege of entering otherwise depends upon the laws in force in the British Dominions of North America. There is no treaty with Great Britain upon the subject other than the first category of the bill, and therefore "unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof" is in respect of their coming into those ports, if they come in, if they are denied or harassed in their effort to come in.

Mr. HOAR. What does "thereof" refer to in your construction?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It refers both to their coming in and to their treatment after they get in, and their being refused to come in at all by unjust and unreasonable and unfair regulations. So we thought, after the most careful consideration we could give to it, that the phraseology we had adopted, taking it consecutively, step by step, would cover every contingency of unfair treatment whether within a law or without a law, if the law were perverted and enforced in an ungenerous and inhospitable spirit, taking advantage of little things, and then putting the process after those little things had been taken advantage of in such a way that the poor fishermen or the poor trader could not get bail in time to save his vessel from forfeiture or anything of that kind, and the President of the United States should endeavor reciprocally to persuade the Dominion authorities from doing that sort of thing, so that on that point as far as my guarantee will go I will warrant the strength of the bill as it stands.

Mr. HOAR. Last winter the committee reported a measure which, it seemed to me then, was totally inadequate and would lead to the trouble which we have had during the present summer—a provision merely making a reciprocal denial of trade in the particular thing. I thought then that the bill was insufficient, and made my opinion known in the proper quarter, but I did not want to interfere in so delicate a matter with the matured judgment of a committee.

I suppose the very good answer to the suggestion made last year was that the public sentiment of the whole country had not been aroused enough to the spirit and character of the Canadian treatment of our fishing vessels to make it sure that they would be at that time prepared to authorize any more stringent retaliatory measures. So I do not question the wisdom with which that bill was drawn. But as to this bill as it stands, while the warranty of the Senator from Vermont is good on a promissory note and many other things, the question whether his warranty will be entirely sufficient as to what the President of the United States may deem himself authorized to do under this bill is another question.

Now, suppose a fishing vessel enters a Canadian port, and therein is subjected to petty annoyances—to a seizure on a mere pretext. It may be said, "Why, how do you know that that annoyance is with respect to the privilege of entry, that the harassment is with respect to its privilege of entering the port?" as said in the sixteenth or seventeenth line, or in respect to "the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews of the most favored nation?" There is nothing to make the particular case one which has anything to do with the privileges attached to other nations. It is simply a vexatious suit or seizure.

It seems to me that the bill would be much safer—and I do not see what objection any member of the committee can have to the amendment—if it contained the general phraseology "if any fishing vessel be unjustly vexed or harassed in said port by the authorities thereof;" that covers every possible case of a malicious treatment under the pretended authority of law by the persons intrusted by the Canadian Dominion with the execution of their laws. I do not understand that the Senator from Vermont suggests any objection to that phrase. What I propose is to add, after the words "the same," the words "or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof," or "the legal authorities thereof."

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the differences between the United States, Her Majesty's Government, and the Dominion of Canada, touching the fisheries, must ultimately be settled either by negotiations or by war. This measure proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations is distinctly, as I understand, one of retaliation. It is an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a fish for a fish, an insult for an insult, and a wrong for a wrong; and before we are called upon to vote it is important that the Senate should be advised whether the bill is intended to be pacific or hostile, whether it is in effect an invitation to negotiation or practically a declaration of war, because there is no use of disguising the situation; there is a feeling of profound irritation between the two Governments, and the real party in interest besides the United States is Great Britain and not Canada. This condition of irritation is at any moment, if the present attitude is continued, liable to lead to discontent, which may ripen into exasperation, and then into open hostility.

Therefore it is of very great importance that, at the threshold, the outset, in the vestibule, we should understand whether this bill is intended as a pacific or a hostile measure.

I have read with some interest the report of the committee, which accompanies this bill, and I will call the attention of the Senate to a few statements on pages 9 and 10 and 15 of the document on our tables. After rehearsing the condition of this subject, as it appears by treaty and by statute and by practice between these two powers, the committee proceeds:

The committee thinks it is not too much to say that such a provision is—in view of the treaty and of the common principles of comity among nations, grossly in violation of rights secured by the treaty and of that friendly conduct of good neighborhood that should exist between civilized nations holding relations such as ought to exist between the United States and Her Majesty's dominions.

The provision being the legislation enacted by the Dominion of Canada—

They continue:

The committee repeats its expression of the firm opinion that this legislation is in violation of the treaty of 1818, as it respects American fishing vessels, and in violation of the principles of comity and good neighborhood that ought to exist in respect of commercial intercourse or the coming of the vessels of either, having any commercial character, within the waters of the other. Had it been intended to harass and embarrass American fishing and other vessels, and to make it impracticable for them to enjoy their treaty and other common rights, such legislation would have been perfectly adapted to that end.

And on page 12:

It will be seen from the correspondence and papers submitted by the President, in his message on the subject, of the 8th of December last (Executive Document No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), and from the testimony taken by the committee, that some of these instances of seizure or detention, or of driving vessels away by threats, &c., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818, and that others were on such slender and technical grounds, either as applied to fishing rights or commercial rights, as to make it impossible to believe that they were made with the large and just object of protecting substantial rights against real and substantial invasion, but must have been made either under the stimulus of the cupidity of the seizing officer, sharpened and made safe by the extraordinary legislation to which the committee has referred, &c., &c.

The committee therefore distinctly charge that the treatment by the Dominion of Canada and the Government of Great Britain of American fishermen has been specifically in violation of treaty rights guaranteed under the convention of 1818, and in addition to that, in violation of comity and the principles of international law.

Mr. President, countries have been deluged and inundated with blood upon less provocation than that. If I understand the declarations of this committee, they announce that the conduct of the Dominion and of Great Britain is sufficient to justify and to warrant a declaration of war on the part of the United States—an intentional violation of treaty rights, a violation not only of treaty rights guaranteed by repeated conventions, but a deliberate and voluntary purpose on the part of Canada and Her Majesty's Government to harass, annoy, and destroy American fishing interests, simply for the purpose either of private gain or of public advantage.

Now, Mr. President, with great deference to the judgment of the committee and to the action which it has taken, in the presence of such grave allegations and with full knowledge of the irritation and discontent existing between these two countries, to report a measure which merely authorizes the President of the United States to resort to acts of retaliation seems hardly commensurate with the gravity of the situation. Either these allegations are not consistent with and supported by the evidence, or else we are entering upon the dangerous course of authorizing the Executive in his discretion to continue in the same line of conduct and policy heretofore existing, and of which we complain, with the inevitable result at last of negotiating for the purpose of settling these questions or of going to war in defense of our rights under the treaty of 1818.

Let me read further from page 15 of the report:

It is recommended that the President of the United States be invested with the power, and that it be made his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that unjust, unfair, or unfriendly conduct is practiced by the British Government in respect of our citizens and their property within the ports or waters of the British dominions in North America, to deny to the subjects of that Government in British North America and their property, or to any classes of them, such privileges in the waters and ports of the United States as he may think proper to name, and to suspend in respect of such vessels or classes of vessels or such property or classes of property of the subjects of such Government the right of entering or being brought within the waters or ports of the United States, so that he shall be able from time to time, as each emergency may arise, to preserve the intercourse between the United States and that Government in a state of fair equality.

I understand that in the bill we passed for the removal of certain burdens upon American shipping last summer, section 17 conferred substantially that power on the President of the United States in general terms, that he was authorized in respect of all nations with which we had commercial intercourse, in case there were unjust discriminations, improper burdens placed upon our commerce, restrictions upon our rights under the law of nations or treaty, to do practically what the provisions of this bill authorize him to do, and I therefore am unable to see in what manner, if the purpose of the committee is pacific, as I assume it to be, the existing power of the President would be fortified by the enactment of this bill. And it has the added difficulty connected with it, that while that legislation was general in its terms, applying to all those powers with which we have commercial relations, this authorizes him to select the Canadian Government, and the Government of Great Britain in connection therewith, for the purposes of his special exercise of this power, and practically places in his control the right to declare war against Great Britain; because it is unquestionably true that in the state of feeling which exists between these powers at this time, if this seizure and reprisal is to go on, if the only way in which we are to correct the evils of which we complain is by permitting forcible recrimination against British and Canadian commerce, there is no result except war. If the committee mean war, well and good; no course could lead more directly to that result.

But if they mean negotiation, if they intend as between two great powers like the United States and Her Majesty's Government or the Dominion of Canada, that a question of this magnitude and importance should be made the subject of settlement upon a fair basis of justice and equality to both parties, then they ought to say so.

My impression is that it will be a great deal better for the country at this time, it would be more in accordance with the dignity of the subject, with the morality that ought to prevail among nations as among men, to declare our conviction that the relations between these two powers are such as to require negotiation, and that there should be authority not only to issue letters of marque and reprisal against commerce, but also to select a commission whose powers should be to consider and, if possible, reach some basis of mutual understanding between Great Britain and this country and the Dominion of Canada about the fisheries.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] forgets that Canada is now playing the same rôle she has twice before; that she plays it for but one purpose, and that to secure negotiations and reciprocal treaties; he forgets that those reciprocal treaties turned to our disadvantage and to her advantage and were abrogated the moment the time arrived when notice could be given.

I believe it to be my duty to the people of this country and to the Senators who have not examined the reports in this case, to group the outrages which have been committed for the purpose of inducing negotiation and reciprocity, within the last six months, and then let the Senator from Kansas say whether or not he thinks we ought to resort at once to negotiation. I say to the Senator from Kansas that if the President of the United States will to-morrow take advantage of that clause in this bill which authorizes him to close our ports against Canadian fish, that will end all trouble between the United States and Canada; Canada will stop her outrages, and then if negotiations are desirable we can enter into them; if, then, a reciprocal treaty is desirable it can be made. It must not be demanded under fire; it will not be granted under the pressure of threats, insults, and outrages.

These cases occurring now and then, and partially reported in the newspapers, lose their effect. I wish to group them and hold the picture up to the country.

In the month of May, the David J. Adams, a fishing schooner, was taken into custody by the Canadian steamer Landeau, carried out of the Province of Nova Scotia, across the Bay of Fundy into the port of Saint John's, New Brunswick, and without explanation or hearing, on the following Monday, May 10, taken back again by an armed crew to Digby in Nova Scotia, where, in Digby, a paper, alleged to be a legal precept for the capture and detention of the vessel, was nailed to her mast in such manner as to prevent its contents being read. At the request of the captain of the David J. Adams and of the United States consul-general to be allowed to examine for the purpose of learning its contents, it was positively refused by the provincial officers in charge; nor was the United States consul-general nor the captain of the David J. Adams ever permitted to know what offense was charged against that vessel.

In the month of June the Martha A. Bradley, the Rattler, the Eliza Boynton, and the Pioneer of Gloucester, Mass., while desiring to pass through the Strait of Canso, a public thoroughfare, a highway for the vessels of all the nations of the earth, were warned to keep outside of an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside Canso Head to a point 3 miles outside the Saint Esprit on the Cape Briton coast, a distance of 40 miles. This line, for nearly its entire continuance, is distant 12 to 25 miles from the shore.

Again, in the month of June the schooner City Point, of Portland, Me., arrived at the port of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, landed two men, obtained water, and for obtaining water and landing two men was seized by the authorities and detained there.

In the provisions of the treaty of 1818 the United States reserved all the rights they ever had (and they were the same rights the Canadians had) on the southern coast of Newfoundland extending easterly to the Rameau Islands and all up the east shore of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence.

These cases show that the Canadians have made no distinctions, that they have seized our vessels for going within the three-mile line on the east shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the south shore of Newfoundland west of the Rameau Islands again and again without the slighest excuse whatever. They claim to stand by the treaty. What becomes of their claim in the presence of the facts?

Take, for instance, the Thomas F. Bayard. Last July the American fishing schooner Thomas F. Bayard, being within the specified limits which were reserved to the United States in the treaty of 1818, was notified by the officer of customs that the vessel would be seized if an attempt was made to obtain a supply of fish for bait or for any other purpose in connection with fishery operations within the limit of three marine miles of the coast of the Dominion or its provinces. To avoid the seizure of his vessel the master gave up his voyage and returned home.

Take the case of the Mascot. The American fishing schooner Mascot entered at Port Amherst, Magdalen Islands—the Magdalen Islands being reserved to the United States in the treaty of 1818—where she had a right to go, and her master was notified that his vessel would be seized if he attempted to obtain bait for fishing or to take a pilot.

THE GOLDEN HIND.

July 23, 1886, the Golden Hind, while four or five miles from land near the entrance to the Bay of Chaleurs, was boarded by an officer from the Canadian schooner E. F. Conrad and ordered not to enter the bay. This order was in writing. She was compelled to go to Tignish, Prince Edward Island, for water, at a great loss and injury to vessel and owner. These cases illustrate completely the sacred regard the Canadian officials have for the treaty of 1818.

THE SHILOH AND JULIA ELLEN.

The same month the Canadian cruiser Terror, as the American schooners Shiloh and Julia Ellen were entering the harbor of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, fired a gun across their bows to hasten their coming to, and placed an armed guard on board each vessel, who remained there until the vessels left the harbor, and that was when they were more than 4 miles from the shore and not under the slightest suspicion.

THE RATTLER.

The schooner Rattler, of Boston, fully laden and on the voyage home, sought shelter from stress of weather in Shelburne Harbor, Nova Scotia, was compelled to report at the custom-house and have a guard of armed men kept on board, there being no suspicion that she was intending to fish within the 3-mile shore line.

THE MOLLIE ADAMS.

Here is a most extraordinary case. In August the Mollie Adams, of Gloucester, on the homeward voyage, full-laden with fish from the fishing banks, was compelled to put into Port Mulgrave for water, and duly made report and entry at the custom-house. The water-tank had bursted on the voyage by reason of heavy weather. The captain asked leave to purchase two or three barrels supply of water for the crew on their homeward voyage of about 500 miles. The application was refused and his vessel threatened with seizure if barrels were so purchased. In consequence the vessel was compelled to put to sea with an insufficient supply of water, and in trying to make some other port to obtain a supply she encountered a severe gale which swept away a deck-load of fish and destroyed two seine-boats.

THE A. R. CRITTENDEN.

In July the schooner A. R. Crittenden, of Gloucester, on the homeward voyage from the open sea fishing-grounds, while passing through the Strait of Canso, stopped at Steep Creek for water. The customs officer at that place boarded the vessel and notified the captain that if he took in water his vessel would be seized. He was compelled to sail without obtaining the needed supply and to put his men on short allowance of water during the homeward voyage, notwithstanding, under the treaty of 1818, we have a right to take water there.

THE EVERETT STEELE.

In September, the Everett Steele, a fishing-vessel of Gloucester, Mass., was about to enter the harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, to procure water and shelter during repairs. Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cutter Terror, boarded her, took her papers and retained them. Captain Forbes, of the Steele, entered at the custom-house. Captain Quigley refused to discharge the vessel, and detained her until the next day, when she could not sail because of a calm. By the delay her bait was spoiled, and the expected profits of her trip were lost.

THE LAURA SAYWARD.

In October the collector at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, refused to allow Captain Rose, of the steamer Laura Sayward, to buy sufficient food for himself and crew to take them home, and retained his papers unnecessarily, thus compelling him to put to sea with an inadequate supply of provisions.

THE JEANIE SEAVERNS.

In October Captain Tupper, of the schooner Jeanie Seaverns, of Gloucester, was prevented by Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cutter Terror, from landing to visit his relatives in Liverpool, Nova Scotia. His relatives were forbidden to go on board his vessel by Captain Quigley, and an armed guard was placed on board to insure that result, thus practically making him a prisoner on his own vessel.

THE MOLLIE ADAMS.

Capt. Solomon Jacobs, of the schooner Mollie Adams of Gloucester, when off Mal Peque, Prince Edward's Island, in a heavy blow, fell in with the Canadian schooner Neskelita in distress. He took her crew on board the Adams about 12 o'clock at night. There were seventeen men in all, and he took care of them, fed them for three days. The Neskelita became a total wreck, but the Adams saved some of the material. Captain Jacobs then ran into the harbor of Mal Peque. The captain of the Canadian cruiser Critic, which was lying there, boarded the Adams and was informed of the facts of the wreck and the condition of the crew. He refused to lend any assistance whatever. Captain Jacobs asked for permission to land some of the wreck material which he had on board, but was refused by the captain of the cruiser, who told him that he could put the saved material on board of a Nova Scotia vessel if he went outside of the three-mile limit, but would not be allowed to land it himself.

None of the people on shore would take the wrecked crew. Remember this was a Canadian vessel that was wrecked, and none of the people on shore would take the wrecked crew unless Captain Jacobs would be responsible for their board. Captain Jacobs finally gave the crew $60, enough to pay their passage home on the cars, and also gave them provisions to last during the journey. There being but 14 feet of water over the bar at Mal Peque and his vessel drawing 14 feet, it was impossible for Captain Jacobs to get out for some days. He lost over ten days in the best part of the fishing season in disposing of the Neskelita's crew, and having so many men on his hands ran short of provisions. He put into Port Medway and asked permission of the collector to purchase half a barrel of flour or enough provisions to take his vessel and crew home. This was absolutely refused, and the collector threatened to seize the vessel if he purchased anything whatever. Captain Jacobs was obliged to leave without obtaining anything, and went home, a distance of over 300 miles, on short rations, the last day before arriving being absolutely without provisions.

On another occasion, at Port Hood, Captain Jacobs, being sick, sent his brother on shore to report the vessel, which he did, and paid the fee of 25 cents. The captain was afterward notified that the report was not good and that the vessel would be liable to penalty for unauthorized landing of her crew unless the captain appeared in person, which, although sick, he was compelled to do, and the fee was thereupon levied a second time.

Now, I say, Mr. President, that you may search the annals of all history, you may even go to that of the Fiji Islands, and you can not find a case, which, for brutality and inhumanity, exceeds that. An American vessel saved a Canadian crew, seventeen of them, from death, took them on board, the master of the vessel thereby breaking up his fishing voyage, entirely fed them until his food was exhausted, carried them into the Canadian port, found there no mercy nor hospitality for their own suffering shipwrecked fellow-citizens, gave them $60 out of his own pocket to convey them to their homes and then asked leave to buy a half-barrel of flour that he might feed his own men on the voyage home, and collector after collector denied to him the right to do so, threatened seizure if he did purchase bread, and these men who saved the lives of seventeen Canadians went one whole day without food because forsooth they had simply been God's messengers to wrecked and suffering men. This took place in the nineteenth century in a civilized and Christian country! The Canadian people are not responsible for it, but the government officials are.

Does not this case demand law rather than negotiation?

THE MARION GRIMES.

In October the American vessel Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., Capt. Alexander Landry, arrived at the outer harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, about midnight, in a severe storm, her sole object in going there being shelter. She remained at the spot where she entered, no one leaving her, until about 6 o'clock the next morning, when she hoisted sail to put to sea. She was scarcely under way before she was arrested and boarded by a boat's crew from the Canadian schooner Terror. Captain Landry was compelled to proceed to Shelburne, about 7 miles distant, to report to the collector.

Let me say right here that no vessel ever came on to the American coast or entered an American harbor from Canada or anywhere else in a storm and was compelled to report. Any foreign vessel may seek our ports, lie there one, two, or three days in shelter from a storm, and then put to sea when the storm is over. This captain anchored at 12 o'clock at night in the outside harbor, lay over until 6 in the morning, then was boarded by the crew of the Terror, and compelled to go 7 miles to the port of Shelburne in order to enter. When the report was made he was informed that he was fined $400 for not reporting the previous night—fined $400 for not doing that which he could not by possibility do. There was no custom-house officer to be found. The fine, however, being imposed through the urgency of Captain Quigley of the Terror, Captain Landry was informed that he would be detained at the port of Shelburne until a deposit to meet the fine was made.

After consultation with the United States consular agent at Shelburne, Mr. Phelan, the United States consul-general at Halifax was telegraphed the facts. Mr. Phelan at once telegraphed to the authorities at Ottawa, setting out the impossibility of Captain Landry's reporting while he was in the outer harbor, and asking that the fine required to release the vessel be remitted and that she be allowed to clear. He was told in reply that the minister declined to reduce or remit the fine, but that the deposit might be made at Halifax. Mr. Phelan at once deposited the $400 at Halifax and telegraphed Captain Landry that he was at liberty to go to sea. Upon attempting to do so Captain Landry was again stopped by Captain Quigley, who gave as a reason for his action that Landry had hoisted the American flag on board while the vessel was in custody of Canadian officials.

The facts were that Captain Landry, while the vessel was in custody, hoisted the American flag, as he had a right to do. Captain Quigley ordered it hauled down, and the order was obeyed. About an hour afterward the flag was again hoisted, whereupon Captain Quigley boarded the vessel with an armed crew and lowered the flag himself. The vessel was finally released under orders of the customs department, being compelled to pay $8 cost in addition to the deposit of $400. The vessel was detained four days, during which time the captain had to keep the crew of twelve men at his own expense. She had purchased a full supply of bait, which was entirely spoiled by the detention. All this under pretense that this man was violating the terms of the treaty of 1818!

THE JENNIE AND JULIA.

Captain Farris, of the schooner Jennie and Julia, a registered vessel, cleared from Eastport, Me., taking out a register, a crew-list, and all the papers necessary for a foreign voyage. This was not a fishing vessel; it was a registered vessel of the United States, and entitled to go into the ports of any nation to buy whatever was not forbidden should be bought and sold, and this vessel was warned off. The captain showed his register to the collector of customs, gave him the papers, and still he compelled the vessel to leave his port, which under the laws of the United States and Great Britain was as open to this vessel as it was to any Canadian vessel.

THE JAMES A. GARFIELD.

The schooner James A. Garfield, with permit to touch and trade, was not allowed by collectors at various ports to purchase anything. The captain was notified that his vessel would be seized whenever there was an opportunity, because he had purchased bait some time before, a charge which he denied.

THE ANNA H. JORDAN.

The captain of the Anna H. Jordan wished to purchase bait at St. Andrews, New Brunswick. He had a permit to touch and trade. Being afraid of trouble, he anchored his vessel outside the 3-mile limit, and went ashore in a dory to enter his vessel at the custom-house. The collector refused to allow him to enter his vessel and ordered him to leave forthwith, saying that he would have nothing to do with his vessel.

THE NOVELTY.

This is a mackerel steamer, Captain Joyce. She was off the Canadian waters fishing. Her coal getting short, she put into a Canadian port to purchase; the officer refused to allow her; the captain appealed to the terms of the treaty; the reply was: "That says 'wood,' not coal." They threatened seizure, and the captain steamed for home, giving up his trip.

Mr. President, all these cases have been reported to the ministry of Great Britain by our Secretary of State, and in nearly every instance this reply has been received:

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1886. [Received May 12.]

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of this day's date, and to inform you that I have lost no time in transmitting copy of this important communication to Her Majesty's Government.

I have, &c.,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

So that Her Majesty's Government have had every case that I now have spoken of, and knows well the utter inhumanity of the acts of these colonial officials, knows that these outrages have been in violation of law as well as of good neighborhood.

But this does not include all of the cases. There are many which have not yet been reported to the Secretary of State, or, if they have, are not included in the report which he sent to Congress a month or two ago. I think the Highland Light may be in this report and overlooked by me. The Highland Light was seized for fishing, tried, condemned, sold, and to-day is a Canadian cruiser. I understand that she caught some fish within the 3-mile shore line as breakfast for her crew.

THE CAROLINE VOUGHT.

This case has been called to my attention to-day. She is a fishing schooner from Boothbay, Maine, Capt. Charles S. Reid. In August, being on mackerel grounds, short of water, she ran into the port of Paspebiac, New Brunswick. A government steamer or cruiser was there. Captain Reid, ordered on board, stated his necessities; was directed to leave at once on penalty of seizure; sailed; a storm coming up, caught rainwater in the sails for his crew.

Now take another case, made known to me a few days since. The captain of an American fishing vessel, whose name I do not recall, reported that he was driven before a heavy gale on the Canadian coast; that he was seeking shelter; that he lost his giant purse-seine overboard in the storm; that he made harbor; that when he had been there about an hour a Canadian vessel came in, seeking shelter from the same storm; that her captain notified him he had picked up his seine. These seines cost from $1,000 to $1,500, and if they are lost the voyage is lost; it is the end of it; and it was exceedingly important to the American captain that he should recover it.

The Canadian captain said, "Certainly you can have it, but pay me $25 salvage." The American captain was willing to pay, but the collector of the port came forward, told him if he paid that man for the seine he would seize his vessel, and it should be forfeited; then ordered him to have no more communication with the Canadian captain under any circumstances; if he did he would seize his vessel. The American captain was obliged to put to sea without his seine, go home, and break up his voyage.

Now, Mr. President, there are probably unreported half as many more cases.

Mr. President, is it not about time to do something? It is about time, I should think. I made a speech on this question at the last session of Congress, and very many Senators indulged in the idea that my words were extravagant as to fact and as to prediction. But this investigation made by this committee and the report now before us show clearly and distinctly that there was not a word of exaggeration in the whole of it. They justify my speech completely.

There were many Senators then who believed, as I did, that Great Britain, one of the foremost nations in progress and civilization in the whole world, when she came to know the facts, would not permit these things to be done by her colony. It was stated here by Senator after Senator, "She does not know all the facts." Now she knows them all. She has them all reported to her by our Secretary of State, and what has she done? Awhile ago, at Ottawa, they enacted a law, an extract from which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

3. Any one of the officers or persons hereinbefore mentioned may bring any ship, vessel, or boat being within any harbor in Canada, or hovering (in British waters) within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors in Canada, into port, and search her cargo, and may also examine the master upon oath touching the cargo and voyage; and if the master or person in command does not truly answer the question put to him in such examination, he shall incur a penalty of $400; and if such ship, vessel, or boat is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom, or of Canada, and has been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing (in British waters) within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of Canada, not included within the abovementioned limits, without a license, or after the expiration of the term named in the last license granted to such ship, vessel, or boat, under the first section of this act, or has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada, for the time being in force, such ship, vessel, or boat, and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof shall be forfeited.

Mr. FRYE. I say that law was passed some time ago by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. INGALLS. Approved by the Queen of Great Britain?

Mr. FRYE. And after all this information about these vessels and these outrages had been conveyed to the Queen of Great Britain or her ministers, two months after the most of them had been, the Queen approved that law. What is the law?

Mr. VEST. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I see from the body of his remarks that he speaks of the hauling down of the American flag by a Canadian custom-house officer. The Senator certainly does not want to leave the impression that the Government of Great Britain has authorized that.

Mr. INGALLS. We do not hear the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I say the Senator from Maine does not certainly mean to leave the impression by what he has said here that the Government of Great Britain indorsed that outrage?

Mr. FRYE. The flag was hauled down by Captain Quigley, of the Terror, taking armed men on board with him to do it.

Mr. VEST. And the British Government afterwards apologized for and disavowed that act.

Mr. FRYE. But that whole statement of fact was communicated to the British authorities, and I have yet to learn that any censure was ever visited upon Captain Quigley, or any punishment inflicted upon him.

Mr. VEST. I refer the Senator, who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to pages 124 and 125 of the message of the President of the United States transmitting the letter of the Secretary of State, accompanied by the correspondence relating to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters, and he will find this note from Mr. West to Mr. Bayard, in response to one from Mr. Bayard calling his attention to this outrage and asking a prompt disavowal on the part of the British Government:

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1886.

SIR: I am instructed by the Earl of Iddesleigh to communicate to you the inclosed copy of a dispatch, with its inclosures, from the officer administering the Government of Canada, expressing the regret of the Dominion Government at the action of the captain of the Canadian cutter Terror in lowering the United States flag from the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., while that vessel was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia.

I have, &c.,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

Then follows the dispatch:

ACTING-GOVERNOR LORD A. G. RUSSELL TO MR. STANHOPE.

HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA, October 27, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada, expressing the regret of my Government at the action of the captain of the Canadian cutter Terror in lowering the United States flag from the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., while that vessel was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, by the collector of customs at that port for an infraction of the customs regulations.

I have communicated a copy of this order in council to Her Majesty's minister at Washington.

I have, &c.,

A. G. RUSSELL, General.

That is a case to which I understand the Senator to refer. While the general case is bad enough, as a matter of history, there is no necessity for making it any worse than it really is.

Mr. FRYE. There may be a good deal more sentiment in the hauling down the American flag when the vessel was in the custody of the Canadian authorities or of Captain Quigley of the Terror, but there is more outrage and inhumanity in the refusal of those custom-house officers, under instructions, to sell a half-barrel of flour to the captain of a vessel who had saved seventeen of their men, and needed the flour to support his men on the way home. I admit that the circumstance to which the Senator has called my attention had escaped my memory, although I knew it before.

Captain Quigley, however, still commands the Terror, still annoys, insults, and harasses our fishermen.

Mr. VEST. I desire the Senator distinctly to understand that I do not wish to be put in the position of defending anything that has been done by the Canadian authorities. I agree with him, but I take it for granted that he wants only facts.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask if this expression of regret was accompanied by any reprimand to the officer who did the act, or by depriving him of his command, or anything of that sort, or is Captain Quigley still sailing the eastern seas and doing the same thing?

Mr. FRYE. He is still sailing the eastern seas.

Mr. VEST. Here is the dispatch, and it speaks for itself. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the Senator from Vermont needs no assistance in construing the words.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not calling my friend in question, but only calling attention to the fact that the most Her Majesty's Government did, so far as she has communicated to us, was to say she was sorry he had done it, but the man who did it is still carrying the Queen's commission so far as we know.

Mr. VEST. I did not read the whole of it. I took it for granted the committee were familiar with it. In what is called "Inclosure 2 in No. 57," on page 125, is this:

Report of a committee of the honorable the privy council for Canada, approved by his excellency the administrator of the Government in council on the 26th October, 1886.

On a report, dated the 14th October, 1886, from Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, for the minister of marine and fisheries, stating that on Monday, the 11th October instant, the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, by the collector of customs at that port for an infraction of the customs regulations; that while so detained, and under the surveillance of the Canadian Government cutter Terror, the captain of the Marion Grimes hoisted the United States flag.

The minister further states that it appears that Captain Quigley, of the Terror, considered such act as an intimation that there was an intention to rescue the vessel, and requested Captain Landry to take the flag down. This request was complied with. An hour later, however, the flag was again hoisted, and on Captain Landry being asked if his vessel had been released, and replying that she had not, Captain Quigley again requested that the flag be lowered. This was refused, when Captain Quigley himself lowered the flag, acting under the belief that while the Marion Grimes was in possession of the customs authorities, and until her case had been adjudicated upon, the vessel had no right to fly the United States flag.

The minister regrets that he—

should have acted with undue zeal, although Captain Quigley may have been technically within his right while the vessel was in the custody of the law.

The committee advise that your excellency be moved to forward a copy of this minute, if approved, to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies and to Her Majesty's minister at Washington expressing the regret of the Canadian Government at the occurrence.

All of which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. McGEE,
Clerk Privy Council.

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the Senator from Missouri. I call the attention of the Senate again to this law, approved within one month after report by our Secretary of State had been made of all the cases but two of which I have spoken——

Mr. BUTLER. Have you the date of the law?

Mr. FRYE. I have not the date of the approval, but I think it was approved about a month ago.

Any one of the officers or persons—

Any petty custom-house officer—is authorized.

To do what? Is authorized to take any ship or vessel that comes into a Canadian port or lies out, hovering within the 3 miles shore line, seize her, take her into port, put her captain under oath, and compel him to deliver up his papers; if he answers any question falsely fine him $400. What more? Examine his whole cargo, and if it is found after examination that there was any evidence of an attempt to fish within 3 miles of the shore line, then confiscate the vessel and turn her into a Canadian cruiser, I suppose.

Mr. BUTLER. Was that law passed by the Canadian government?

Mr. FRYE. A law passed by the Dominion of Canada and approved by the Queen of Great Britain. How can it help bringing on war? What captain of an American merchant ship sailing about his business will permit himself to be seized by a Canadian petty official of the customs department and carried into a Canadian port, and then his whole cargo overhauled, just as that petty official, "armed with a little brief authority," sees fit to do it, he himself put under oath and compelled to answer questions, and if he does not tell the truth in every answer fined $400? Our hope that Great Britain would be fair and just is destroyed, and we ought to have known that such would be the result.

There is not a line of history of Great Britain for the last three hundred years giving us the slightest reason to believe that in the pursuit of commercial advantages, in the extending of her trade, she would ever permit another's right to stand in the way of her progress. Why, then, should she interfere with her colony for attempting in a feeble way to imitate the home government?

Mr. President, again: Newfoundland four or five years ago passed a law which provided that Newfoundland fishermen should not be permitted to sell any bait whatsoever to any American fishermen; but that law was not approved, was a dead letter. If the telegraphic dispatches are correct, within the last ten days that law has been resurrected and approved.

Mr. DAWES. How long had it lain?

Mr. FRYE. Four or five years, perhaps six.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will pause. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate at 2 o'clock the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the act supplementary thereto.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that that be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside informally with a view to the Senator from Maine closing his argument.

Mr. INGALLS. Or to the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. HOAR. To go on with the debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the understanding, unless objection be made.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that out of all the cases hitherto reported by the Secretary of State to the British authorities, out of all the cases reported to the Secretary of State, out of all the cases that have come to my attention—and many have—there never has been but one in which there was a suspicion, or a ground for suspicion, that the American vessel was violating the treaty of 1818, and intended to fish, or had fished, within the 3-mile shore line. The Highland Light is the only one. She paid the penalty by her death as an American fishing vessel, and she caught enough for the crew's breakfast. That is the only case in all the written history of the last year.

Sir, I say that under the treaty of 1818, so far as I have examined these cases, every one of these seizures, detentions, and fines was in violation of its spirit, and four out of five were in violation of its letter. I say that every one of them was in conflict with the principles and customs of good neighborhood, in conflict with the understanding of all the civilized nations of this earth as to the rights of foreign ships in the waters of another nation.

The Senator from Kansas alluded to the fact that we passed a law in the shipping bill. We did; a law which I offered and which was reported as an amendment, by the Committee on Commerce, to the shipping bill. The American people at that time did not know what Canada was to do. The American people would not believe that the Canadian authorities would do what they have done since then. I feared that the Senate and the House of Representatives would not go to the extent I desired to go, and I trimmed my law as closely as it was possible to do. It provided for retaliation in kind only. If they refused to permit a fishing vessel of the United States to buy bait, the President was authorized to issue a proclamation refusing to allow Canadian vessels to buy bait in our ports. That was all there was to the law.

It does not reach the disease. It does not afford a cure. Our people will not do, nor permit to be done what the authorities of Canada are doing. You can not persuade them to do it. During the whole year Canadian vessels by the score have been in the port of Portland buying bait, thousands and tens of thousands of dollars' worth, right at the very time when our vessels could not buy a squid in a Canadian port, or if they did they were fined $400. Ay, more; there has not been an hour that a Canadian vessel could not come into our ports for shelter and lie there as long as the storm lasted and sail on the sea without making entry or paying a cent, without let or hindrance, and our vessels could not go into their ports at the same time and lie six hours, the hours being the night time, without being fined $400 if entry was not made.

No, Mr. President, the American people know that they are sixty million; they know they are the richest nation on the earth; they know their power. They will not humiliate themselves and outrage their conscious pride by resorting to these little miserable tricks and outrages by way of retaliation. What we ask is that if the President of the United States, upon whom the responsibility as the Chief Executive of this great nation rests, believes the interests and the dignity of this Republic require him by public proclamation to close our ports to all Canadian fishermen, against any merchant vessel or all merchant vessels, against any of the products of Canada, he shall have the power to do it. The Queen of Great Britain has the power to-day, all the power conferred upon the President by this law, and has had it for twenty years. She may close her ports against any of the vessels of the whole world if she sees fit and the honor of her realm requires her to do so.

Now, sir, is it not safer to trust the president of a free republic, who goes to the people every four years, with that power than it is to trust a king or a queen who holds office for life? I see no objection to it.

I say that the President of the United States never will be called upon to do but one thing, and what is that? Take advantage of this bill and issue his proclamation that no fish, fresh, salted, or canned, the product of Canadian fisheries, shall be landed in any port of the United States, and you will never hear of another outrage by the colonies of Great Britain while the world lasts. But if these outrages are to continue, and finally a reciprocity treaty respond as it has before, then when we abrogate that treaty look out for your outrages once more.

Mr. President, will the Administration take advantage of this law? The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, who is in entire accord with the Administration, I suppose, has presented a bill which goes a great deal further than this one, a bill which authorizes the President of the United States to proclaim absolute non-intercourse. I know nothing about the inspiration of that bill, but I do not believe that this gentleman offered it until he knew whether or not the Administration was in sympathy with the proposition.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] a few days ago presented here a bill going to the very extreme, even to the interdicting of the transit of Canadian cars, engines, &c., across our boarders; and the Senator from Maryland, if these are his views, I know to be a friend of the Administration.

The Secretary of the Treasury, whom I esteem one of the brightest men in this Administration, lately sent a communication to Congress in which he reviewed the conduct of Canada in this matter, and finally summed up his opinion. What was it? Her conduct is simply brutal, says the Secretary of the Treasury. I know his sentiments.

The Secretary of State, who communicated to Congress the volume I hold in my hand, has not said in any communication to the British Government that the conduct of Canada, their colony, was brutal; it would not be diplomatic; but he has said, using the language of diplomacy, over and over and over again, that these are outrages, and that the United States will demand restitution for the wrongs which have been done. He has said "look out," as near as diplomacy will permit him to say it.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. GRAY. The Secretary of State has almost used the language which the Senator from Maine has used when, in a communication to Sir Lionel West of September 10, he closed by saying:

> This inhospitable, indeed inhuman, conduct on the part of the customs officer in question should be severely reprimanded, and for the infraction of treaty rights and commercial privileges compensation equivalent to the injuries sustained will be claimed from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. FRYE. I knew that the Secretary of State had gone to the very verge that he could go and use diplomatic language. Our minister in England, Mr. Phelps, has made an unexceptionable, clear, complete, and, to me, an entirely satisfactory statement of this whole case.

Now, Mr. President, what right have I to suggest, because a law was put on the statute-book eight months ago, and the President of the United States has made no use of it, that he will not to-day make use of the power which this law confers on him if this bill becomes a law? I said the other law was limited, so limited that it had but little power as against Canada.

This bill has power in it. The President of the United States, I believe, is an American citizen who has at heart the honor, the dignity of the great Republic over which he presides. He is an American citizen who, I believe, sympathizes with every other American citizen. He is an American citizen who believes in protecting the rights of American citizens everywhere. Ay, more; I believe that he is an honest man, and if you place the power contained in this bill into his hands, he will use it for the protection of our rights, for the maintenance of our honor, and that we, as a Congress, have no right to-day to doubt or to hesitate over the question whether or not he will properly use the power; that to us there is a plain, clear, unmistakable duty, and that is to give the Chief Executive officer of the Republic power enough to protect our honor and the rights of our citizens.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, one object I had in view in the remarks I made has been accomplished. I desired to ascertain the purposes and intentions of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the legislation they have proposed. Ambiguous so far as its incentive was concerned, I was in doubt whether it was intended to remit the subject to the domain of diplomacy, or whether it was designed as a declaration to Great Britain that this course, if persisted in, would result in war. I understand from the statements of the Senator from Maine, if he speaks for the committee, as I suppose he does, that should Congress enact this bill into a statute it is a definite declaration to Great Britain that she will continue these practices at her peril, and if they are persisted in they must be enforced by war.

Mr. EDMUNDS (in his seat). Oh, no; that does not follow at all.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont says, sotto voce, "that does not follow at all." The statement of facts made by the Senator from Maine constitutes a casus belli under the law of nations. I knew them before, for I had read the report of the committee and the testimony they had taken; and I knew then as well as I know now since that recital that those outrages and wrongs constitute by the law of nations a casus belli. If continued, amicable intercourse would be impossible.

I therefore desired that the Senate should know before being called upon to vote whether the purpose of the bill was to invite diplomacy or to announce to Great Britain that this proceeding had been carried to the extremity and limit of peaceable endurance. Sir, the voice is the voice of Canada, but the hand is the hand of Great Britain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I interrupt you for a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend from Kansas mean to say that any act of a nation which refuses entrance of the people of other countries into their ports, where there is no treaty obligation which authorizes them to enter, is necessarily a casus belli?

Mr. INGALLS. I mean to say that habitual, declared, avowed, and recognized violations of treaty obligations and of international law are casus belli. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is a pretty safe statement.

Mr. INGALLS. And that is what this report says. Let me read it again, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter:

> The committee thinks it is not too much to say that such a provision is, in view of the treaty and of the common principles of comity among nations, grossly in violation of rights secured by the treaty and of that friendly conduct of good neighborhood that should exist between civilized nations holding relations such as ought to exist between the United States and Her Majesty's dominions.

Yet the Senator from Vermont intimates, if he does not state, that there has been no declaration of facts on the part of this committee that constitutes a casus belli.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So far as it regards the violation of the treaty, any violation of it that is intentional may be considered on the part of the wronged party a cause of war if the nation that is wronged chooses to resort to that last resort of kings. But any violation of the principles of good neighborhood by one nation towards another that is under no treaty obligation and which has a right to say that nobody should come within its borders if it pleases, is not a casus belli.

So the case is simply this, as to the treaty: Where the British authorities (for I will use that phrase for short) have denied to American fishing vessels the right to fish in the very places, as they have in one or two instances, perhaps more, where by the treaty American vessels had a right to fish, that would, at our discretion, undoubtedly be a ground of going to war; but according to the practice of all nations who do not wish to shed blood unless they are forced to do it, it would be a reason for reciprocal retaliatory measures which should bring the offending party to a sense of the inconvenience of his carrying on that sort of thing. It does not necessarily follow that every breach of a treaty is to be followed by a war.

Mr. INGALLS. How about a continued, persistent, deliberate, willful violation of treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That might be another thing.

Mr. INGALLS. That is "another thing;" that is this case.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me in that connection to propound to him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I presume the seizure of the vessel of one nation without right by the vessel of another, taking it by force into its custody, is as clear a casus belli as can be supposed. Is it any the less so if it is done under a pretended, and not real, lawful authority, that is, getting up fictitious and unfounded charges? That seems to me to be the case. As I understand it, the wrong which Canada has done to us does not consist chiefly in a scramble for the right of fishing in certain waters as if we were whalers on the high seas; it consists in an attempt on her part to compel us to repeal certain laws of a wholly domestic character—laws imposing customs duties—and to enter into negotiations with Great Britain for that purpose by seizing our vessels under a pretense of right where no right exists.

Mr. INGALLS. That purpose does not anywhere appear.

Mr. HOAR. That purpose is manifestly disclosed from the recital of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh! from the recital of the committee, to be sure; but it nowhere appears from the evidence that there is any such purpose on the part of Great Britain. So far as the evidence discloses, these acts are a deliberate, willful, brutal violation of American rights for ulterior purposes not disclosed. That inference of the committee is purely gratuitous, so far as the evidence goes.

Mr. HOAR. My question was to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. INGALLS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont to answer it.

Mr. HOAR. I asked whether that did not constitute a casus belli. I asked his inference, not that of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, it may be granted that it does constitute a casus belli; but there have been, in the history of nations who are generally humane and reasonable and who prefer peace to war, an infinite number always of occurrences that would constitute and did constitute a casus belli that were not followed by war on the demand of the wronged party, although it had the power to go to war. So the books of public law and the archives of the department of foreign affairs of every civilized country on this globe, are full of instances where the agents and officials by which only governments can act have done wrongs which were clearly inexcusable and which would justify the wronged nation in going to war on the principles of public law, if they thought that was the best way; but like the case of throwing turf at the boy in the tree, which all Senators remember, and the case of coming to stones afterward, reflection always comes in. The nation that is reasonable, and is strong, and is firm, will resort, as it always does at first, to endeavoring to counteract these evil influences by bringing the other party to see that it will not be to their interest to continue that sort of thing. There is not any great confusion about it so far as I can understand.

Mr. INGALLS. I express my belief that this bill, if enacted, would be a declaration to Great Britain that she would pursue these practices at her peril; that they had to stop, and if they did not stop we would try to make them stop.

I should like to know from the Senator from Vermont what is the idea of this bill, what its purpose is. It must have an ulterior purpose. Mere reprisal or application of the lex talionis does not mean anything in itself. This thing must ultimately be settled either by treaty or by war.

Mr. HOAR. Or by stopping it.

Mr. INGALLS. It can not be settled by stopping, because it is liable to be restored again by any individual interruption. It has got to be settled, so far as these two powers are concerned, either by diplomacy or by blood. I understood the Senator from Maine to say that this transaction had proceeded to the extent, to the very frontier of amicable solution, and now the Senator from Vermont says that that interpretation is incorrect; that it does not mean war.

Mr. DAWES. Do you agree with the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. INGALLS. I agree with the Senator from Maine, and I should like to know what the Senator from Vermont means, or understands the bill to mean. Does he want this business settled by negotiation or by fighting?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither.

Mr. INGALLS. He does not want it settled at all, then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the jump of my friend out of the frying-pan into the sea, which would probably cool his skin, but he would drown. There is the other alternative that the Senator from Massachusetts has suggested, which is the common one among people.

As to settling this matter by negotiation, where so far as treaties now go as to fishermen alone—I will stick to them for the moment—the treaty of 1818 is just as clear as it can be. The places where American fishermen are authorized to fish and where they are not authorized to fish are clearly defined by geographical boundaries and descriptions that nobody misunderstands; you can not by any new negotiation make them any clearer; and if you believe the evidence of great numbers of all the people engaged in this business they do not want to fish anywhere else; it is no advantage to them to do it. So much for that.

Then you come to the question of the unjustifiable treatment of these people under the treaty. The treaty says exactly how they are to be treated. They are to be allowed shelter; they are to be allowed to get certain supplies purely as fishermen; but they are not to be allowed to fish there. That is all. And the other party has the right to make whatever restrictions are necessary to prevent their abusing the right of coming for these other purposes into the places where they are not to fish. The treaty there is just as clear as human language can make it. Then it comes to a mere question of what it is fairly and reasonably necessary to resort to on the part of the British Government to protect themselves against illegal fishing by the people who come in for shelter, &c., as they have a right to do.

Now, then, the regulations which they have made, as it appears to the committee, and as I think it will appear to the Senate when they come to that, in the way they have been framed and in the way they have been administered, are not a fair execution of that treaty, but are plainly outside of it. That may be a casus belli if the United States chooses to consider it such. It may be a case where rights are clear and where they have been invaded, like the wrongful conversion of any citizen's property by another nation at any time. It may be a case for that counteracting legislation and action on the part of the government whose cititens have been wronged that would lead the people who are wronging them to consider that it would be for their interest to stop that sort of thing.

Now we come to apply it to this case. This bill provides that if our vessels are mistreated in Canadian ports—pure fishing vessels, I will stick to that now, for the time being—and are denied or embarrassed in the fair exercise of the rights that they have, the President of the United States may, as a countervailing operation, say that the Canadian fish, and the Canadian fisherman, and the Canadian trader, and the Canadian everybody else shall not come into the waters of the United States at all. Suppose he says that; that is not war. Suppose it continues for ten years; it is a question of who can stand it best. I think the people of the United States can stand it best, and it will be a persuasion to those people to mitigate accordingly the somewhat rough asperity of their manners and the somewhat irregularity of their conduct. Suppose it does not. Then you have simply got non-intercourse between the British provinces and the United States. The question is, short of war, who can stand that the longest. I think there can be but one answer to that proposition.

So the question whether we have got to fight to protect American fishermen in their rights that they are entitled to under the treaty alone (I speak of that now), as I said before, is not a question at this present moment or this present year of any war, but it is a question of countervailing regulations which all nations have resorted to long before, and usually never coming to a war afterwards, in respect of adjusting these rights.

The very matter of these fisheries has been for a hundred years carried on in the same way. Her Majesty's Government have, from time to time, made their regulations or authorized them to be made, and they have been made, and they have executed them, and the Congress of the United States has authorized the President, under our laws, to adjust his conduct accordingly as to whether they could come here or whether they could not. So it is no new thing; and it is not war. There may be war if, by and by, it is found that it is impossible for these countries to adjust this matter under clear and definite rights as they now exist, and one party or the other may go to war. The British Government may say, "If you do not choose to admit Dominion vessels into the United States which you are under no treaty obligation to do, we will go to war with you," as we might with China, because she will not admit American vessels into every one of her ports and places; but that is a very ultimate and a very far-off question.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont states that the question in controversy between these two powers is the interpretation or construction of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not say that.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator to say it, and I was about to inquire, these subjects once having been the subject of negotiations and treaty stipulation, how the question of construction or interpretation, one being asserted by one power and denied by the other, was to be settled by retaliatory legislation.

But I respectfully submit to the Senator from Vermont that there is a great deal more here than a question of interpretation of a treaty or the construction of its provisions. There has been a brutal seizure of ships under circumstances of peculiar atrocity and insolence. Armed vessels under the control of British officers have overhauled our fishermen peacefully plying their vocation, put guards aboard of them, subjected them to humiliating conditions, ordered them out of port, refused them roadstead, denied them the right to fill their tanks and barrels with water, refused them food and shelter, and the Senator from Maine grouped many instances in an assembly of humiliating indignities. Yet the Senator from Vermont states that this is merely a question of the interpretation of a treaty, the construction of the stipulations of the convention of 1818.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said anything of the kind, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I will say that I so understood the Senator. I asked him what his understanding of the purpose of this bill was, and he proceeded to say, as I understood him, that it was to obtain a construction of the disputed provisions of the treaty of 1818.

It may be that the British Government, by these unwarranted seizures and atrocities, outrages and wrongs, admitted to be in violation of that treaty, have had no ulterior purpose except to compel us to accept their construction of that treaty, to subject us to duress and coercion to force the United States to admit their interpretation of the marine league, of the rights of the fishermen, of the rights of shelter, water, food, and fuel were such as they proposed to put upon them. But I do not read these transactions in that way; the American people do not read them in that way. There was some design and purpose other than to obtain a peaceful solution of the question of the construction or interpretation of doubtful provisions of the treaty of 1818.

Sir, England has always been the ruffian, the coward, and the bully among the nations of the earth; insolent to the weak, arrogant to the feeble, cringing and obsequious to the strong, her history for centuries has been a record of crimes against the human race. In Ireland, in Scotland and Wales, against the Roman Catholics, against the Boers of South Africa, against the Hindoos and the Chinese, against the Afghans, the Persians, and the Egyptians, wherever there has been a feeble and helpless people, Great Britain has appeared for the purpose of rapacity, plunder, and conquest.

England bears no good will to this country. The memory of defeat in two wars rankles, I have no doubt, in the breasts of Englishmen. When I say that Great Britain is not friendly to America, I mean that the ruling classes are not, and that they have never been.

Their course toward us has uniformly been one of supercilious insolence and of outrage. They cheated the South with false hopes of recognition, and they outraged the North by violating the rights of neutrality. Their action in the treaty of Washington was controlled solely by a fear of the consequences to their own commerce in the next war in which they might be engaged if they permitted the precedent that they had established to stand undenied.

I believe that there is no special reciprocity and good-will on the part of America towards England. There are few Americans who do not regret Waterloo. There are few Americans who do not recognize the fact that the conduct of Great Britain towards this country has been characterized by jealousy and malevolence from the beginning of our national existence, and that she is our only enemy among the powers of the earth.

If I read these transactions aright, there is no desire on the part of Great Britain to secure a peaceful solution, a pacific interpretation of the doubtful provisions of the treaty of 1818, but a deliberate design to so far foment the irritation, the discontent that exists between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada as to prevent the pacific political affiliations of those two powers in the immediate future, which would be inevitable if it were left to the operation of the natural laws of politics, of trade, and of society.

I think I discern very plainly what the purpose of Great Britain has been in this matter. She means to render it impossible for free, friendly, reciprocal relations, political and other, to exist between Canada and the United States. Therefore I rejoice to hear the interpretation placed upon this proposed legislation by the Senator from Maine, that so far as he is concerned if we adopt this measure it is to be a declaration to Great Britain, recognizing her agency and her power in this matter, that she will proceed further at her peril.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not think there will be any very great necessity for further argument in support of this bill to convince the minds of a majority of Senators of the expediency of the measure. But the State which I represent is more interested five times over than all other communities together in the immediate controversy. Of the vessels which have experienced the outrages and annoyances recited in the report of the committee, twenty-five belong to the State of Massachusetts besides four whose port is not stated, and seven to the State of Maine, formerly a part of Massachusetts.

I understand that the object of these annoyances and grievances which have been recited in the report of the committee is not principally or largely to assert the British or Canadian interpretation of the treaty of 1818. A dispute is sought in regard to the terms of that treaty, not to protect the sources of the fisheries from an interference by Massachusetts or Maine competition, but it is to compel the people of the United States to change their laws in a matter of purely domestic concern. It is not that Canada may catch fish without molestation; it is that she may sell fish without the interference of the American tariff policy that these difficulties are fomented.

I regard, in that point of view, the attempt by a foreign country by hostile interference with our ships on the high seas, or in the neighborhood of their ports, or in their ports, to enforce upon us, against our will, a certain domestic policy as being one of the most emphatic and flagrant acts of hostility that can be committed without actual war. These seizures, with the exception perhaps of one or two instances, are seizures upon a pretense and without the reality of any interference either with treaty or with local regulation or law by the American vessels.

This attempt on the part of Canada has received, as is apparent from the diplomatic correspondence, the full countenance of the mother country, of which Canada is a dependant. It is said that in one instance there has been an expression of regret for the actual lowering of the American flag. I do not see that the lowering of the American flag is in substance an offense at all equal in rank, of which we have any more reason to complain, than the taking custody without actual right of American vessels and their masters and crews when they are about their lawful employment. It is an affront undoubtedly; it is an insult; but the substance of the offense is not the lowering of the flag, but is the seizure of the ship whose nationality the flag protects.

The apology which has been conveyed to us is not the apology which is due for the outrage. There is no apology on the part of Great Britain, but a simple communication to us by the British minister of an expression of regret of the local dependency, with which we can have no diplomatic relations, and whose satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the act of the officer is of no sort of importance. The absence of any other expression of regret, either for the single action to which this relates or for the series of offenses or outrages of which that is but one, is a more significant matter, as it seems to me, than the single expression which has been communicated to our Secretary of State by the British representative to this country.

I do not understand, with the Senator from Kansas, that the object of this measure is to bring about either a war on one side or new diplomacy or negotiation on the other. All that is done is that we say to Great Britain, and to the Dominion of Canada through her, that so far from accomplishing anything in the way of diminution, or lightening, or repeal of our customs duties by this course of conduct, so long as it continues you shall not be permitted to sell your fish or any other product of the offending district in the American market.

The only answer to this measure which is to be expected, and all that will be expected, and which will be effectual, is a communication of Great Britain that she has given orders that this course of offensive proceeding shall stop. It requires no new treaty, and certainly, I think, requires no further exertion of force on the part of the American Government.

It is high time, as it seems to me, that this bill was passed. When the Senator from Maine last year, representing the Committee on Commerce, proposed the narrow and ineffective provision which is contained in the law passed in the last Congress, I informed him that, in my judgment, it would turn out to be insufficient, and that the proceedings of the last session of Congress, instead of putting a stop to or preventing these outrages, would tend to provoke new ones, and that in the then coming summer the complaints would spring up more frequently than summer before last.

An eminent Representative from my own State, representing the Cape district, Mr. DAVIS, introduced in the House of Representatives, shortly after the measure which originated in the Senate last year had passed, a bill which is in substance and in principle the bill which is now before the Senate. That was followed by the introduction by my colleague [Mr. DAWES] of a similar measure in this body. It was not thought best by the representatives of Massachusetts, on consultation with one another at that time, to undertake to interfere further with the policy of the committee to which the Senate had committed this subject. Although our State had so large and deep an interest in the result, we preferred to allow the measure which they had agreed upon to be tried and tested, although in our judgment it was entirely insufficient and ineffective. We are very glad, all of us, to be satisfied that the history of the last year and the full and faithful investigation which the committee have made, have vindicated the wisdom of the opinion which we expressed at that time.

I desire, without detaining the Senate further from a vote, to move an amendment which the Senator from Vermont informs me that he agrees to, and which he himself has modified a little. I will read it from his draught. I move to insert in the bill, in the eleventh, twenty-first, and thirtieth lines, on the second page, the language which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, after the word "rights," insert the words "or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places;" so as to read:

That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places.

In line 21, after the word "thereof," insert the words: "Or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein."

In line 30, after the word "same," insert the words: "Or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to speak to the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to speak to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be adopted if the Senator has no objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that other Senators desire to look at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has the floor on the pending amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee who reported this bill, and it received my cordial approbation. I was also a member of the subcommittee which formulated the bill, and it was carefully considered there in connection with the evidence which had been collected, not only from their own investigations under the order of the Senate, but also from the archives of the State Department as far as we had access to those archives.

After that committee had entered upon its work, and before it was ready to make its report, the Secretary of State sent a communication to the Senate in which was developed at large correspondence on this subject; and I had the happiness to find that the committee and the Secretary of State, without any division of party at all, were entirely agreed in their views of the conduct of the British provinces and of the British Government towards our Government in respect of this very important and very delicate matter.

The committee in preparing the bill and bringing it forward into the Senate first took into consideration what was the actual condition of the treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain respecting the British provinces in North America, and a very close, narrow investigation of the whole field of inquiry satisfied us that we were entirely without treaty engagements with Great Britain in respect of our commerce with the Canadian Dominion. It is true that in the treaty of Washington we have mutual stipulations in respect of transportation, liable to be suspended, I believe, upon two years' notice or upon the failure of either Government to carry out in good faith, according to the opinion of the other Government, the provisions of those mutual stipulations. But the Senate will do well to remember in approaching this question and in deciding what is its duty in respect of it that the United States have no commercial engagements with Great Britain with reference to our commerce with the Canadian provinces. Our engagements are limited to what I have already stated and to the treaty of 1818 relating to the fisheries. The relations between the United States and the provinces of Canada depend entirely upon the statutes of the two countries, and not upon any treaty engagements; so that in legislating upon this question we have an open field in which we are permitted to exercise our own sweet will without question on the part of Great Britain. We can establish by act of Congress any of the ordinances that we see proper for the regulation of our commercial relations with those provinces, and so they can do the same thing.

When two countries, thus neighbors to each other, are thus situated in respect of their treaty obligations and are left only to provide for their mutual interests by legislation, it is very clear that if the Dominion of Canada, backed by the Government of Great Britain, shall legislate in hostility to our trade it becomes not only our duty but our only alternative to legislate in hostility to theirs, to legislate according to the principles of retrosion and of retaliation, if you please.

If we had commercial treaties with Great Britain respecting our relations to the Canadian provinces, we should of course be attempting to understand whether the proposed legislation of the Committee on Foreign Relations was in any sense in conflict with those commercial regulations agreed upon by treaty; but having nothing of the kind, as I before observed, the field is entirely open to us, and we have no alternative but either to negotiate our first treaty of commerce with Great Britain in respect of the provinces, or to go on in the old line of legislating pro and con so as to balance up our interests and make them mutually agreeable.

It is not a credit to these great English speaking peoples on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, who control so immensely the destinies of commerce and all other destinies of the inhabitants of this earth, that we should have been all this long time, more than a hundred years since our independence, without a treaty of commerce to regulate our relations with that part of the British possessions which lies next to us and upon this continent. But so it is, so it has been, and so it is likely to remain.

The Senator from Kansas was anxious to know whether the committee proposed to go to war. About what should we go to war? Not, certainly, on account of the breach of any commercial treaty with Great Britain in respect of the Canadian provinces, for we have not got any. It would be a war of words, necessarily followed by a war of acts of a commercial character simply, if we should have a war, for there is to be no broken engagements brought to the attention of any government in consequence of the conduct either of Great Britain or of our Government upon these questions, unless it may be that some rights which have been guaranteed to our fishermen in the treaty of 1818, not commercial rights, but fishery rights, shall have been violated by the Canadian Government or by ourselves.

The treaty of 1818 is the real point of dispute between us—the construction of it, the question of its proper enforcement, and the question of the responsibility of the British Government for the acts of the Dominion in regard to that treaty. That is the real bone of controversy between us to-day, and it is about that which we differ. We are undertaking to improve our condition in respect of our differences on that subject, and other commercial questions between us and Great Britain or the Canadian provinces, by the reformation of our statutes, so as to give to our own Government by the authority of Congress under the sanctions of law that degree of power which is necessary to enable our Government to protect itself and to protect its people against aggressive acts on the part of the Canadian provinces or the Government of Great Britain, as you please. That is all of it.

This is not a new sort of legislation on our statute-books. We have had many acts on the general subject, and we have some general laws, which I find in the Revised Statutes, based precisely upon the principle of this measure. I call attention to section 4228 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

> Upon satisfactory proof being given to the President, by the government of any foreign nation, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or imposts are imposed or levied in the ports of such nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country, the President may issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are suspended and discontinued—

> so far as respects the vessels of such foreign nation, and the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported into the United States from such foreign nation, or from any other foreign country; the suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States, and their cargoes, shall be continued, and no longer.

There is the whole principle of this bill. It is put in a different form in that enactment, but only in a different form; the principle is precisely the same. Suppose that we should enact a law, to-day, in Congress that there should be no commercial intercourse between the ports of the United States and of Canada, but that the President of the United States might suspend that law and permit commercial intercourse between the two countries whenever it was made satisfactorily to appear to him that our fishermen upon the coasts of Canada were received with hospitality and treated with humanity. That would be a constitutional law, and it would be a wise provision, but the Committee on Foreign Relations have not thought it best to advise the Government of the United States to come to a positive determination of law in advance that there should be no intercourse, and allow the President to suspend that law at his pleasure; but the committee prefer to give the President power to suspend as to certain articles or as to any importation of their goods, based upon satisfactory evidence brought to his attention that that Government have treated our men of commerce and our fishermen also with injustice upon their coasts, and have harassed and detained and imprisoned and insulted both them and the flag under which they sailed. So this is not a novel principle in the Government by any means, nor is it novel in respect of this particular question.

General Grant, in his annual message in 1870, made the following recommendation:

> Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighborly acts toward our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of the laws authorizing the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada.

Going further than this bill goes—

> And further, should such an extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

That was a faithful declaration of American policy based upon American honor by a man who had proper respect for it, and I honor him in his grave for the fact that he did anticipate the hour of trouble that we now approach, and forestalled it by that wise and manly declaration in his message of 1870 to Congress.

So this is not a new question at all; it is not a question that has not been under consideration heretofore. Congress in its efforts last year to provide a law by which this subject could be reached merely failed to go far enough to accomplish the end that was intended. The legislation in this bill is precisely in the line of that proposed in the last Congress, and which was passed by both Houses, that not going far enough to reach the evil which we now have to confront.

Under these circumstances would the Senate of the United States be content to leave the President of the United States without power enough to control the commercial intercourse and regulation between this country and the Dominion of Canada so as to produce an equilibrium or a parallelism, to say the least of it, between the rights and privileges that they enjoy in our ports and harbors and those that we enjoy in theirs? I can scarcely think that we should not be otherwise than delinquent in our duty if we omitted to arm the President of the United States with the only power which appears now to be effectual for the purpose of producing this mutuality of benefit and advantage and freedom in trade between these two countries. Our Government is not now equipped with power enough under the statutes to do that which is becoming to our honor and to our interests and the protection of the individual men of our country engaged in this lawful traffic, and also engaged in a higher duty even than that—preparing themselves to become the chief element of strength in the great naval enterprises which we expect in the future to establish in this country. I am not willing to remain any longer in a condition of impotence and disability when I know that the power to confer this authority upon the only person in the United States who can properly exercise it rests in the hands of Congress, and not in the hands of the treaty-making power.

Great Britain can baffle us as long as she pleases by saying she will make no commercial engagements with us respecting Canada. "We have none to improve; we have none to interpret; we sit down on our own interpretation of this fisheries matter, and we intend to stand upon it; but so far as you are concerned you have no engagement of ours by which you can coerce us to do any better than we have been doing in the past in respect of the interest and honor and liberty and rights of your people." That is not the condition in which our country ought to be left. Patriotism forbids it; duty to the country and to posterity alike forbid it.

Some question has been raised here as to the purpose of the committee in reporting the bill. The Senator from Kansas seemed anxious indeed to ascertain whether the committee were going to bring the country into war, and I have had Democratic Senators question me about that who desired to know whether the committee were about to make a declaration of war against Great Britain. Can we not in the quietude of our own country and in the repose which attends this Chamber pass laws affecting our own commerce without making threats against any person in the world? It would not be becoming in us to make threats, nor is it necessary. When our resolutions are reached we are strong enough in the expression of them to convey to the world at large the idea that we mean what we say.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I desire to know if the bill has been presented to the Secretary of State, and whether it is in accordance with the views of his Department.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill has never been presented to the State Department. As long as I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body I shall never consent to present any bill to a coordinate Department of this Government, unless it is a bill upon which I want to get information. I have frequently observed of late that bills have come in here recommended by Presidential messages, and I have always thought that it was out of order for this body to receive one. I have as much cordial regard and respect for this administration as any member of the United States Senate; I had great respect for Mr. Arthur's administration also, and he was in the habit of doing the same thing; but I believe this body has no right to receive a bill at the hands of any man except a Senator upon this floor. I believe that after a bill has been offered by a Senator here and referred to a committee, except for the purpose of enlightening that committee upon the facts which might make it proper or improper to legislate in the direction of the bill, it would be a serious impropriety to refer it to any other Department to ascertain its wishes. The President of the United States has the veto power.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will allow me to say that I asked the question simply because it has been the practice to refer bills to the heads of Departments for information, and I thought in this case the committee might have done so.

Mr. MORGAN. We have all the information. The bill was brought in, as I remarked in the outset of my observations, after we had all the information the State Department could furnish us in its report, and I congratulate the country and the committee upon the fact that when we came to present our bill and our report, we found ourselves precisely in line with the administration upon this question.

Mr. DAWES. I am somewhat surprised at the interrogatory made of the Senator from Alabama. Nothing is clearer in parliamentary law than that it is unparliamentary in either this or the other body to refer to the opinions of the executive department of the Government as influencing legislation. I am aware it has grown somewhat to be a habit, but when I first came to Congress a member of either branch was sat down in his seat who undertook to question the propriety of any measure pending by calling in the opinion of the executive department either for or against it.

Mr. MORGAN. I was about to observe that the President of the United States, under our Constitution, has the veto power, and whenever we bring measures to his attention with which he is not satisfied he can easily revoke our action, provided two-thirds of both Houses do not overrule his determination. So the legislation of the two branches of the Government must necessarily be entirely independent. But in this case, I repeat the observation, I am very glad, indeed, to find that the President of the United States, through the Secretary of State and also through the expressions of Mr. Phelps in the correspondence submitted to us, is precisely in harmony with the committee of the Senate.

Sir, I do not see how the Government of Great Britain could address a note to our Department of State inquiring into the motive of this legislation any more than the Government of Spain or the Government of Prussia could address a note to our Secretary of State to inquire why it was that we spread upon the statute-books discriminations against them in their commerce and their tonnage and their ships, which should remain until the President of the United States should lift them by a proclamation. It has been but a few months since we had a controversy with Spain over this very question. We had a little convention, or rather a sort of agreement with her not amounting to a treaty, entered into between the executive powers of the two Governments, by which more liberal terms of commercial intercommunication were permitted between Cuba and the other Caribbean possessions of Spain and the United States.

After a while the President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, became satisfied that Spain was not observing good faith in the execution of that agreement, and thereupon immediately he restored, by his proclamation, discriminating duties against the flag of Spain. Afterwards, when Spain came and made acknowledgment of her mistaken action and removed the difficulty, the President made another proclamation in which he restored Spain to the favor that she was entitled to under that little agreement. So it is, whipping back and forth, that this power in the hands of the President of the United States is a necessary power to preserve the balance of commercial differences between countries, and that we cannot abandon that as a part of our statutory system without crippling our own Government. The Committee on Foreign Relations, at least, do not propose to abandon it; but they come now to apply it in a case which in its nature is delicate, I admit, and somewhat provoking to American pride and American honor and duty.

I will read from Mr. Phelps's letter of date June 2, 1886, to Lord Rosebery. My purpose in reading this is simply to show that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations is scarcely up in the vigor of its language and in the heat of its argumentation to what Mr. Phelps said in his direct address on this question to Lord Rosebery. I shall commence with reading the latter clause of his dispatch first to answer some interrogatory or suggestion that has been put here to-day in respect of the purposes of the British Government and the Canadian Government in this series of unlawful acts which, taking the liberty that the Secretary of the Treasury indulged in, I am permitted on the floor of the Senate to call brutal, without any offense I think to the ears of Senators or to British susceptibilities. Here was a plain, positive, direct man, speaking like an American ought to speak upon a question of this kind. His concluding sentences are these, found on page 136 of the documents sent us by the President:

> The real source of the difficulty that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty remained in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

That is a pretty plain and positive statement of the cause of the disagreement. He proceeds:

> It is not necessary to say that this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle. In terminating the treaty of Washington the United States were simply exercising a right expressly reserved to both parties by the treaty itself, and of the exercise of which by either party neither can complain. They will not be coerced by wanton injury into the making of a new one. Nor would a negotiation that had its origin in mutual irritation be promising of success. The question now is, not what fresh treaty may or might be desirable, but what is the true and just construction, as between the two nations, of the treaty that already exists.
> The Government of the United States, approaching this question in the most friendly spirit, cannot doubt that it will be met by Her Majesty's Government in the same spirit, and feels every confidence that the action of Her Majesty's Government in the premises will be such as to maintain the cordial relations between the two countries that have so long happily prevailed.

Now I ask the Secretary to read that part of the text that is marked in the margin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> But even were it possible to justify on the part of the Canadian authorities the adoption of a construction of the treaty entirely different from that which has always heretofore prevailed, and to declare those acts criminal which have hitherto been regarded as innocent, upon obvious grounds of reason and justice, and upon common principles of comity to the United States Government, previous notice should have been given to it or to the American fishermen of the new and stringent instructions it was intended to enforce.
> If it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recall the instructions which I have shown had been previously and so explicitly given relative to the interference with American vessels, surely notice should have been given accordingly.
> The United States have just reason to complain, even if these restrictions could be justified by the treaty or by the acts of Parliament passed to carry it into effect, that they should be enforced in so harsh and unfriendly a manner without notice to the Government of the change of policy, or to the fishermen of the new danger to which they were thus exposed.
> In any view, therefore, which it seems to me can be taken of this question, I feel justified in pronouncing the action of the Canadian authorities in seizing and still retaining the David J. Adams to be not only unfriendly and discourteous, but altogether unwarrantable.
> The seizure was much aggravated by the manner in which it was carried into effect. It appears that four several visitations and searches of the vessel were made by boats from the Canadian steamer Lansdowne, in Annapolis Basin, Nova Scotia. The Adams was finally taken into custody and carried out of the Province of Nova Scotia, across the Bay of Fundy, and into the port of St. John, New Brunswick, and without explanation or hearing, on the following Monday, May 10, taken back by an armed crew to Digby, Nova Scotia. That, in Digby, the paper alleged to be the legal precept for the capture and detention of the vessel was nailed to her mast in such manner as to prevent its contents being read, and the request of the captain of the David J. Adams and of the United States consul-general to be allowed to detach the writ from the mast for the purpose of learning its contents was positively refused by the provincial official in charge. Nor was the United States consul-general able to learn from the commander of the Lansdowne the nature of the complaint against the vessel, and his respectful application to that effect was fruitless.
> From all the circumstances attending this case, and other recent cases like it, it seems to me very apparent that the seizure was not made for the purpose of enforcing any right or redressing any wrong. As I have before remarked, it is not pretended that the vessel had been engaged in fishing, or was intending to fish in the prohibited waters, or that it had done or was intending to do any other injurious act. It was proceeding upon its regular and lawful business of fishing in the deep sea. It had received no request, and of course could have disregarded no request, to depart, and was, in fact, departing when seized; nor had its master refused to answer any questions put by the authorities. It had violated no existing law, and had incurred no penalty that any known statute imposed.
> It seems to me impossible to escape the conclusion that this and other similar seizures were made by the Canadian authorities for the deliberate purpose of harassing and embarrassing the American fishing vessels in the pursuit of their lawful employment. And the injury, which would have been a serious one if committed under a mistake, is very much aggravated by the motives which appear to have prompted it.
> I am instructed by my Government earnestly to protest against these proceedings as wholly unwarranted by the treaty of 1818, and altogether inconsistent with the friendly relations hitherto existing between the United States and Her Majesty's Government; to request that the David J. Adams, and the other American fishing vessels now under seizure in Canadian ports, be immediately released, and that proper orders may be issued to prevent similar proceedings in the future. And I am also instructed to inform you that the United States will hold Her Majesty's Government responsible for all losses which may be sustained by American citizens in the dispossession of their property growing out of the search, seizure, detention, or sale of their vessels lawfully within the territorial waters of British North America.
> The real source of the difficulty that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty remained in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in order to show further that this committee is in a line with the present administration, I will read an extract from the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1886, calling for an interpretation of the tariff laws respecting the duties on fish. On page 13 of his report the Secretary of the Treasury says:

During the past summer, while American vessels, regularly documented, have been excluded from the hospitality and privileges of trading in Canadian ports, Canadian fishing vessels have been permitted freely to enter and use American ports along the New England coast, have been protected by this Department in such entry and use, and have not been required to pay any other fees, charges, taxes, or dues than have been imposed upon the vessels of other governments similarly situated. The hospitality elsewhere and generally extended in British ports to American commercial vessels has not been less, in quality or quantity, as I am informed, than the hospitality extended to British vessels in American ports; but there is this marked difference, that, while this Department protects Canadian fishermen in the use of American ports the Dominion of Canada brutally excludes American fishermen from Canadian ports. This dependence of port hospitality, as between this Government and the British Government, in respect to vessels of either, is emphasized by the seventeenth section of the law of June 19, 1886, empowering the President to suspend commercial privileges to the vessels of any country denying the same to United States vessels. That section is in harmony with a section in the British navigation law which authorizes the Queen, whenever British vessels are subject in any foreign country to prohibitions or restrictions to impose by order in council such prohibitions or restrictions upon the ships of such foreign country, either as to voyages in which they may engage or as to the articles which they may import into or export from any British possession in any part of the world, so as to place the ships of such country on as nearly as possible the same footing in British ports as that on which British ships are placed in ports of such country.

There is a statement of the whole doctrine, there is a statement of the necessity of mutual legislation on the part of each power to provide the necessary means of keeping up or preserving the equilibrium of our commercial intercourse in respect of the privileges of the ports and otherwise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to say that that was stated in the discussion in the Senate on the very law to which the Secretary refers, and has been stated all the time, and was in the bill passed by the Senate in respect of the export of meats, &c., which was sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. I remember very well the Senate passed a bill reported by the lamented Senator from California, Mr. Miller, and that bill was distinctly predicated on the idea that in France and in Germany our American meats were excluded from their markets or discriminations against them were made continually to the detriment of our own people upon pretended complaints as to the quality of the meats, &c. Thereupon the Senate passed that bill, after due consideration, authorizing the President of the United States, in case the discrimination should appear to be not genuine and honest and sincere, but from some motives of local policy, to retaliate by excluding their sugars, or whatever it was that we put in the retaliatory clause of the bill; I do not now remember what.

I do not understand that there has been at any time since I have had the honor of being a member of this body any difference of opinion among Senators upon the question of the right and duty of the American Government to provide laws that the President of the United States might exercise this species of retaliation, if you please to call it such, in our commercial intercourse with foreign countries. So far from its being a warlike measure, it is a measure to prevent war. If we should to-day declare war, as we have the right to declare that the British Government have violated the treaty of 1818, that it was a casus belli, and that it was our duty so to treat it, we should bring these two countries by the ears in a very savage way, to the expenditure of much treasure and blood. But the Senate of the United States and the Committee on Foreign Relations do not think of entering upon that ground.

Let the facts that may possibly compel or justify such a procedure as that rest where they are now, in the womb of the future, and probably American policy, and statesmanship, and resolution, and material will be quite sufficient to meet each emergency as it may arise. But this committee are acting in the most peaceful way, on the side of peace, so as to furnish opportunities by which our Government may call the Government of Great Britain to pause and reflect upon the question, first, "How much is this going to damage your commerce? How much is this going to cut you off from the profits of the rich and convenient trade with the people of the United States? Perhaps after you have duly weighed that question under the influence of a positive example set by a proclamation of the President of the United States relating to fish, then you will have sufficiently recovered your composure to deal with us in a more friendly, if not fraternal, spirit than you have been doing." We want to interpose an opportunity for cool reflection on the part of these governments, directed to their commercial interests, and addressed to the sound sense of the commercial men who control these countries. It will not be necessary that the President of the United States shall issue a proclamation of embargo or a proclamation of entire suspension of commercial relations with the Canadian provinces or any other part of Great Britain.

I am quite satisfied that when the Canadian fishermen find that they have got no market in the United States for a pound of their fish and can not afford to carry them across the Atlantic Ocean or the Pacific Ocean to foreign markets, they will at once consult the great moving power of nations and of men, the pocket nerve; they will find that quite influential enough to arrange all of their disputes and difficulties without resorting to the muscles and nerve of the right arm of power, the war-making power.

There is no war in this measure. There is peace in it, and nothing else. But if we allow the existing condition to go on there will be war in it, and that beyond our control, for I must say that I applaud the spirit of those men who, knowing that their rights are interfered with; who, understanding that their rights are distinctly expressed by Mr. Phelps in this dispatch, by Mr. Bayard in his communications with the foreign office of Great Britain and with Mr. West, by the Senate of the United States, and by Congress in various legislative acts and resolutions; by President Grant in his message of 1870, by the concurrent opinion of almost every American statesman—knowing that they are right, have been emphatically clear in their self-restraint. But these men will at last say to themselves: "We can not afford to starve; we can not afford to burn our ships or turn them to a different trade; we can not afford to give up the avocations of our lives and go into some new pursuit; we are fishing lawfully upon the high seas, and if we happen to enter within 3 miles of a Canadian coast it seems we are likely to be overhauled and our flag hauled down, our officers and men insulted, our property taken and confiscated, and no damages returned to us. We do not intend to stand it; we will fight." And the first man that is killed, yes, the first blood that is dropped in a controversy of that kind upon the Canadian coast will be the tocsin of war, and the people of the United States would be plunged into it just as rapidly as they were by John Brown's raid at Harper's Ferry, perhaps more; and they would go into it unanimously on this occasion, for you will find just as much support on the Gulf of Mexico as you will on the coast of Maine for American fishermen in the defense of their rights.

Now, Mr. President, it is worth while for both these countries to arm themselves with all the powers of a law that may be necessary to prevent a conflict between individuals by which, as I have argued and I believe, a war may be precipitated upon us beyond our power to control. We can not afford to stand still under these circumstances. This Committee on Foreign Relations have not felt that it would be at all excusable in the estimation of the American people if under such exigencies of necessity it should decline to act in a matter of so grave importance as this. It brought forward a bill of which there are examples in our legislation already, recommended everywhere through our diplomatic correspondence and through all expressions of our statesmen who have ruled in the Department of State and in the Presidential office. Would there be any good reason, then, why we should not now act? I shall be very happy to realize the hope, which I certainly entertain, that this bill will pass almost without dissent on the part of the Senate.

I desire to close my remarks in this case by an extract from the report of the committee, historical in its character, which I put into the RECORD for the purpose of showing the complete justification historically of the action taken by this committee. I will hand it to the Reporter to be incorporated in the RECORD.

The extract from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations is as follows:

Without going into a general review of the discussions that have in former years taken place concerning these matters, it is, as the committee thinks, sufficient to now treat these questions as they are affected by the principles of public law and by the presently existing treaty between the United States and Great Britain bearing upon the subject.

This treaty was concluded in the year 1818. To understand its just and true application it is perhaps proper to refer, by way of inducement, to the state of things theretofore existing.

The treaty of peace concluded at the end of the Revolutionary war, which acknowledged the independence of the United States, provided in its third article that the people of the United States "shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish. And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, but not to dry or cure the same on that island, and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground."

This article, it will be observed, recognized an existing right and practice in respect of American fishermen exercising their calling not only at sea on the banks of Newfoundland, but in all places in the sea within what would be strictly British waters. And it will be observed also that this treaty said nothing on the subject of commercial intercourse between the people of the United States and those of the British provinces.

The next treaty was that of 1794, by the third article of which it was provided as follows:

"It is agreed that it shall at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of said boundary line [being the land boundary line between the United States and the British Provinces of North America] freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation, into the respective countries of the two parties, on the continent of America (the country within the limits of the Hudson Bay Company only excepted), and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other. But it is understood that this article does not extend to the admission of vessels of the United States into the sea-ports, harbors, bays, or creeks of His Majesty's said territories; nor into such parts of the rivers in His Majesty's said territories as are between the mouth thereof and the highest port of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect; nor to the admission of British vessels from the sea into the rivers of the United States, beyond the highest ports of entry for foreign vessels from the sea."

A later article in the treaty of 1794 (Article XII) provided that for a limited period, named in the treaty, citizens of the United States might engage in carrying trade to any of His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies under certain conditions named. A later article (Article XIII) provided that vessels belonging to citizens of the United States should be admitted into all the sea-ports and harbors of the British territories in the East Indies, &c. A later article (Article XIV) provided that there should be between the dominions of His Majesty in Europe and the territories of the United States a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation, &c. Another article (Article XIII) provided for admitting American vessels in distress into all of His Majesty's ports on manifesting its necessity to the satisfaction of the government of the place.

So far as the present question is concerned the foregoing represents the state of the treaty arrangements between the United States and Great Britain down to the close of the war of 1812. By the treaty of 1815, following the treaty of peace of 1814, it was provided in Article I that there should be between the territories of the United States and all the territories of his Britannic Majesty in Europe reciprocal liberty of commerce, &c.

In a later article of the same treaty (Article II) it was provided that the intercourse between the United States and His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America should not be affected by any of the provisions of that article, but that each party should remain in complete possession of its rights with respect of such intercourse.

No other article of the treaty touched the question of intercourse between the United States and His Majesty's dominions in North America.

The next treaty bearing upon the present question was that of 1818, which is now understood to regulate, so far as it goes, fishing interests of whatever kind of the citizens of the United States in the territorial waters of the British dominions in North America.

All of this treaty that bears directly upon the present subject is contained in Article I, which is in the following words:

"Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty, claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company. And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

This article sets out with stating the precise subject with which it has to deal, namely, that differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

Thus it will be seen that the matter to be dealt with was a claim in favor of the inhabitants of the United States to do certain things within the territorial dominion of His Majesty, and not a matter touching the right of the inhabitants of the United States to cruise, fish, or do any other thing in waters that by the public law of nations did not belong to the territorial jurisdiction of His Majesty.

The matter to be dealt with being, then, simply that affecting American fishermen coming within the territorial dominion of His Majesty, it was provided that Americans might fish on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; and on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, and on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company; and that the American fishermen should have the liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador, subject to non-interference with settlers, &c.

And by the same article the United States renounced any liberty "to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above mentioned limits; provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

The committee is of opinion, in view of this history and of the plain language above quoted, that this article was intended to deal and did deal only with the subject of the admission of American fishermen within the territorial jurisdiction of His Britannic Majesty as defined by the public law of nations.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New York allow the Chair to dispose of some matters on his table.

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

ROSELLA E. HIBBERT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert; which were, in line 5, to strike out the word "twenty" and insert "twelve;" and at the end of the bill to add:

To be paid to her legally constituted guardian for her use and benefit.

The amendments were concurred in.

LUCY E. ANDERSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2301) granting a pension to Lucy E. Anderson, which was, in line 9, to strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9854) to remove the political disabilities of S. Barron, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF STREETS AND AVENUES IN WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of August 4, 1886, certain information in regard to the extension of streets and avenues as proposed in Senate bill 2201. Accompanying the communication there is a map. The Chair will refer the matter to the Committee on Printing with a view to determining the question of printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2981) to abrogate the powers of the executive officers of the United States in allowing indemnity locations or scrip for confirmed, unsatisfied private land claims, under section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 11, pages 294 and 295, chapter 81), and to vest that power in the courts of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of a committee representing the medical profession of the United States, praying that an appropriation be made to aid in defraying the expenses of the international medical convention to be held in Washington, D. C., in 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I present a very reasonable and proper petition from 186 citizens of Republic, in the State of Michigan, praying for a reduction of the internal-revenue taxes as soon as the condition of the Treasury will warrant. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3173) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I desire to state as briefly as may be the attitude which the two countries, Great Britain and the United States, now occupy on the subject under debate. Much that I have thought it of some importance to introduce into the debate has been anticipated, in some degree at least, by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and I shall endeavor not to repeat simply what he has so properly presented.

We have a treaty with Great Britain regulating a fishery between the two nations on the seas and in the neighborhood of the possessions north of us in the power of Great Britain We have no treaty of commerce regulating our commercial intercourse between our great country and this important section of the British possessions known as the Dominion of Canada.

The treaty on fisheries has been a subject of debate and of irritation and an occasion of strife and a danger of war. After the renunciation of the fishery clauses of the treaty of 1871 we were brought back at once to the imperfect understanding between the two countries as to the meaning of the treaty of 1818, and as to the proper application of such permissive faculty as we had in going into the ports that were not opened by any commercial treaty.

Under this condition of things the Canadian authorities have, as by authority of their right under the treaty of 1818 affecting fisheries, attempted to exclude our fishermen from what would be an ordinary and suitable and necessary intercourse of comity in matters of commerce. If we submit to that view, if we accept that construction of the treaty of 1818, then we should be necessarily in the position of undertaking negotiations to modify and qualify that treaty, and with such success by countervailing advantages that we might concede to Great Britain as should remove this constant source of irritation and exposure to misunderstanding and even umbrage ending in war.

The first question then for us is whether we accede to that interpretation of the treaty of 1818. If we do not accord the exercise of authority now giving so much offense to our people and engaging great diplomatic correspondence between the two countries, if we do not concede that to be the treaty which would authorize this impression and injury upon our commerce, then we are to say under what right and under what cover of pretext can we suppose this vexatious treatment of our shipping interest to be based? Manifestly there can be no other ground upon which these interferences, which seem to us contrary to the almost necessary comity between friendly nations in commerce, can be maintained except under the claim that there is no commercial treaty which obliges Great Britain and her dependency in the Dominion to admit this commercial intercourse that we have been in the habit of and desire to continue.

If then on that ground and on that ground alone this interference must be based when taken by the Dominion authorities, and is to be sustained by Great Britain, we have in our power according to the same right and level of commercial claim the same measure that Great Britain has, and we are not called upon to take the first step in that. Our action does not need to be called retaliatory; it is responsive. The first step in disturbing commerce was under a claim that there was no obligatory treaty of commerce that held us to enjoy these privileges; and this is but a responsive step on our part upon the same line of proceeding that they have taken.

And this brings us directly back to whether it be true that under the construction of the treaty of 1818 none of this disturbance and interruption and interference on the part of the Dominion authorities can be justified. I do not propose to debate that question. The settled opinion of this Government now is that the treaty of 1818 is nothing but a fishing treaty, and not a commercial treaty at all. It is regulative of the fishing interest as there described as the subject-matter, and the basis of all the provisions that have entered into that treaty. It is not a restriction of commerce at all; it is an enlargement of mere fishing rights under the very limited allowance of shelter and repairs and procuring wood.

Now, how did it happen—for we must understand how two great nations came to deal with this matter in the way they did, without a larger treatment of the subject of commerce—how did it happen that this treaty of fisheries was entered into and nothing said about commerce? As has been well pointed out in previous debates in this body at the last session, at that time the colonial system of Great Britain did not tolerate, did not propose to invite, did not propose to encourage or support commercial intercourse between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; but by the progress of mutual advantage and interest and good neighborhood this commercial intercourse was opened, not by treaty, but by statute law on the one side and the other, that permitted the reciprocal opening of this commercial intercourse between what is now within the Dominion of Canada and the United States; but that right rested entirely upon domestic legislation and upon authority to be exercised by each nation according to the policy and existing law of the country that put its interest in action.

We, then, are not ready to acquiesce in a debate concerning the meaning of the treaty of 1818 which shall have the actual and practical result on the part of Great Britain of exercising toward our commercial intercourse what is really an interruption, a destruction pro tanto of these interests while that matter goes on in debate. If the Dominion authorities, if Great Britain have taken the view of the treaty of 1818 supporting the legislation and the practical exercise of the power that is now under debate, our answer is, "You have no such rights, you have no such control; the subject-matter concerning which you deal is not embraced in the treaty of 1818, and we consider that the whole action that may have taken place, all that you have authorized, all that you propose, all your defense and support of it is under your right of having no treaty commercially obliging this relation to be kept open and proceeding upon your own domestic interest and your own domestic legislation." That being so, what is there for this country to do but responsive to that attitude, not protected by the treaty of 1818, but open under the dominion of their own law and of their own policy, not regulated by any treaty with us, obtain a footing and place our people in the same attitude in respect of these rights, while the debate proceeds as to the treaty of 1818 for the ascertainment of any further negotiations. So long as comity and courtesy and freedom of commercial intercourse are withheld, not under treaty but by positive law and authority, and only under positive law, we so respond.

Now, Mr. President, this bill, as it seemed to the committee, was carefully drawn. One clause here probably will be sufficient for the President of the United States, certainly sufficient for him at the outset, perhaps:

> To deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

And as he has free choice and can moderate the application of exclusion to this or to that topic, it is the fish clause, and the fish clause alone which will make it understood that while England and the Dominion of Canada take one view of the treaty of 1818, the United States take another view of the treaty of 1818; and the action of the authorities, the regulations of law, the support, so far as it is given by the Imperial power of Great Britain are under their own regulation of commercial intercourse with us, when there is no treaty governing the relation.

But it is asked, is this not in the nature of menace, is it not unfriendly, is it not tending to, at least, if not requiring a severer attitude between the nations than that of separate views on the subject of commercial intercourse? Why, sir, we can not alter the situation or the subject of the irritation. We find it made for us. As I have said before, it appeared whenever there came up a dispute of what the true application of the treaty of 1818 was, and we have found harsh, peremptory, and confiscatory measures put in action against us and our fishing interests, not our conceded view of the treaty but the British view of the treaty; and now that we have made up our minds on this point it is for us to take this subject at once out of the hands of the local disturbances, of the irritations, of the resentments, of rash and dangerous encounters by mischance or by misfortune that shall urge both nations into the presence not of a calm calculation, not of a deliberate consideration of what the true relations are and should be in commerce, but of what the rights and the duties of the people of the two countries and of the governments are in support of the maintenance on this side of the new quarrel made out of the dangerous circumstances that surround us.

So far, then, from this bill proposed by the committee tending to war, tending to umbrage, tending to make parties in the great contest of Great Britain and the United States becoming involved in resentments and retaliations against their will, it is an immediate announcement to the people of our country vitally interested, practically encroached upon, that the nation has accepted this view and has undertaken to place their protection at once, not in their personal resentments but in the representation of the Government of the United States, by placing the attitude of commercial intercourse on a footing of equal disfavor toward Great Britain that Great Britain in this proceeding has exhibited to us. And from that moment when the opening summer shall bring about a recurrence of the fishing season and of the fishing dangers they will be removed from that scene, from that theater of collision, and will be already if not concluded, at least under control of both governments in a deliberate consideration of what shall be done in regard to suitable intercourse, suitable to the interests of both of the neighboring communities, and suitable to the peace and dignity of the two great nations, the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am earnestly in favor of this bill, and it seems to me that it is a bill which every member of the United States Senate can freely and unrestrainedly vote for. I believe in its provisions because I believe them to be not harsh but moderate, not rash but well considered, and that the provisions of the bill when adopted as law and carried out by the Executive will be efficacious.

The situation for a year past has been simply intolerable. The aggressions upon this interest of ours at the hands of the Dominion authorities, persisted in as they have been against every expostulation and entreaty on the part of our authorities, are such as we have never submitted to since the infancy of the Republic. I am bound to believe that these aggressions, these assaults upon the rights of our citizens, high-handed as they have been, have been, not either by passion or by accident, but upon deliberate premeditation and predetermination.

There is no man who has followed the history of these acts on the part of the Canadian authorities which have caused such loss and suffering to our citizens, but must come to the conclusion that they have been part of a deliberate and arranged plan by the Canadian authorities, backed up in a great degree or entirely by the British Government. From the day when the first fishing vessel was seized, from the day when they began to enforce in this brutal way—for it is not too strong a word—everything during the season of 1886 ran in one direction. I have sent for but have not been able to obtain the instructions that were given to the commanders of the armed vessels that were sent down there to lay their strong hand upon our fishermen. I remember reading them; I remember distinctly, at the time when they appeared in the public press, and the whole animus that lay behind those instructions was one of deliberate, unprovoked hostility to our interests in these waters.

Here was another thing unprecedented so far as I know in the history of diplomatic negotiation. The Secretary of State interposed so far as he might by calling the attention of the British Government through its minister here and otherwise through specially constituted counsel to appear in their courts, and in every way, until perhaps the resources of the State Department were exhausted, and nothing came of all this. Here was this singular condition that while negotiations were being attempted, expostulation was resorted to to prevent outrages upon our citizens. They were going on with increasing harshness, and the provincial rules and regulations, which have no foundation in international or any law, were being more and more rigorously enforced.

There is no opportunity for fair negotiation between any two great powers, or between any two powers, when the acts which are complained of upon the one side are persisted in upon the other side. That is the death of negotiation.

As I have said, I know of no precedent where a fair negotiation entered upon by the representatives of any two powers has taken place where the acts complained of which are the cause and subject matter of the negotiation had not for the time ceased; and if they do not cease, I repeat it, that is the death of negotiation, and there must be some other process resorted to. The last dreaded process is the appeal to that last, most formidable and dreaded tribunal, that of declared hostility and war.

The bill meets my favor, and I think ought to meet the favor of every Senator here, because in a conservative way, realizing what this dread alternative means for these two great peoples, it does invoke another interposition.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Did I understand the Senator to say "war?"

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether I said "war" or not. I may have used that word, perhaps.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. HALE. The merit of the bill lies in a nutshell, that the committee has found another interposition, in diplomacy, if you choose to call it that, in its result upon diplomacy in the form of legislation which is based upon the lex talionis. I feel like congratulating the committee upon having found this remedy, for I believe it will be a remedy and will avert the last dread remedy.

To my mind, if this bill becomes a law, the provisions which authorize and with the force that they will come before the Executive they will, I believe, be interpreted by him as a direction, under the authority that is given to the President to issue his proclamation closing our ports under certain restrictions, shutting out certain Dominion vessels and British vessels, and particularly the clause that is found from lines 41 to 44, will furnish the remedy. By these provisions the President is authorized—

To deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

When that provision becomes a law, passed by the American Congress, approved by the American Executive, and is enforced in direct and prompt and manly fashion, as I believe it will be, then it will be seen by our Canadian neighbors that the United States is thoroughly in earnest, that it appreciates their purpose, that it realizes how deep laid is their plan, and that it has had recourse now, here, at once, to a retaliatory measure that will bring these neighbors of ours to their senses, and that will lead to a condition where, if further negotiation be desirable, it is practicable.

That, sir, as has been said here, and as I believe truly, will lead to the suspension of these acts on the part of the Canadian authorities, to their abandoning their policy, so that our fishermen may go into those waters as they have in years past, without improper let or hindrance, and pursue their vocation. That provision will clear the skies; that provision will leave the subject-matter so that any further negotiation may be entered upon between these two great powers. The evils that give rise to the negotiation having ceased, and the two powers, or their proper representatives, in that calm and deliberate way which ought to characterize diplomatic negotiation, may see to it that the rights and interests of the two countries in the future shall be regarded and assured. And until the American Congress has formulated some law that shall accomplish this purpose and sound this note to our Canadian neighbors, not of menace, but of warning, these things that have been so intolerable in the last year will continue in worse fashion through the year coming.

I am sorry to say that I have reason to believe from intelligence—I think I may call it that—which comes to me from the seat of Government of the Dominion, that there is at present, under the course that we have pursued, no intention on the part of the Canadian authorities to abandon the course they have maintained in such a hostile manner towards us in the last year; and as long as it remains, and nothing is done by us, or as the Senator from Vermont says, nothing but talk, then they will persist, whatever may be their ultimate object, whether it be to drive us from their waters, whether it be to oblige us to give them better terms with reference to their fish, or whatever it may be, they will persist in it until some sharp, drastic measure is adopted by us and maintained and carried out. And so, Mr. President, I feel, as I have said, like congratulating the committee on being able——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask who does the talk?

Mr. HALE. Yourself perhaps.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not the only one.

Mr. HALE. You shall have all the opportunity you want when I am done.

The committee should be congratulated on finding this other project, plan, scheme, or whatever you may call it, that will direct the attention of the Canadian authorities and of Great Britain to the view which is growing with the American people, a view which shows that the American people do not mean to be trifled with, and yet while it has its merit it is not a harsh, ill-considered, rash war provision.

For these reasons I shall vote for the bill, and I hope every Senator will do the same.

Mr. VEST. May I inquire of the Senator from Vermont if he proposes to press this measure to a vote this afternoon?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do most decidedly. There are only thirty working days left of this session.

Mr. VEST. It is perfectly immaterial to me; but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is out of the Senate necessarily on a conference committee, and he has some amendments which he wishes to have printed and the bill to go over until to-morrow. I can hardly take the responsibility of offering his amendments myself, though I promised him to have them printed. I have some amendments myself also that I should like to offer to the bill; but if it is the pleasure of the Senate to go on this afternoon we must do so.

Mr. BUTLER. Will it do for the Senator from Vermont to have an hour to-morrow designated at which we shall vote?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to accommodate everybody, but this is a subject which has been before the Senate and Congress for a long time, and we have a very short period left in which to transact the public business. I think, therefore, it is a duty I owe to the Senate in respect to the public business to ask the Senate to go on to-day and finish this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. This bill has been before the Senate but one day that I remember.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore the Senator is himself mistaken in saying it has been before the Senate a long time. I have not heard it discussed before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said the subject had been.

Mr. BUTLER. There are other gentlemen who are anxious to discuss the bill. I have no such purpose. I believe it is customary to grant the courtesy of a postponement where a Senator desires to discuss a question. Therefore I shall move, if the Senator of Missouri will yield the floor to me for that purpose, that the Senate adjourn, with the understanding that we take the vote on this bill to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to know if it is understood that we can have a vote at a particular hour.

Mr. VEST. I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to modify that motion, if I may be permitted, and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to say a word before the question is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to address the Senate pending this motion. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. I merely wish to remind the Senate that the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution was the unfinished business for the first week of the session, and that last Friday I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration upon the close of the morning business to-morrow morning. I shall feel bound to make that motion at that time, no matter what is done now. I hope the Senate will see fit to continue the consideration of this bill and conclude it to-night. At all events, whatever action is taken, I should like it to be with notice that to-morrow morning I shall move the consideration of the Constitutional amendment.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont that if there is any idea of adjournment or going into executive session, I should be very glad to have a vote taken on the resolution I have been endeavoring to bring to the action of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not agree to anything whatever. The Senate perfectly understands this question, and we are to do as a majority of the Senate on yeas and nays shall decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion for an executive session.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. DAWES (after having voted in the negative). It escaped my mind that I was paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], who is absent at this time, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS (after having voted in the negative). I have been requested to pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], and I withdraw my vote for that reason.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is absent, paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. My colleague, if here, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Berry,	George,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Butler,	Gray,	Payne,	Walthall,
Coke,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Whitthorne,
Eustis,	Harris,	Vance,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Brown,	Frye,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Call,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Teller,
Cheney,	Hale,	Morrill,	Williams,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—29.

Allison,	Dawes,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Beck,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Fair,	Maxey,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Voorhees.
Cameron,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have not voted, and do not intend to vote when I see that there is a motion to adjourn. I decline to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I move to amend the bill in its phraseology on the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]—which I thought was unnecessary, and still do—in the manner that the Secretary at the desk has the words.

Mr. HOAR. That motion is pending. It has been made by me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. VEST. I was under the impression that I had the floor after this motion for an executive session was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor. The amendment proposed was suggested some time ago. The Chair received the amendment. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, I offer an amendment handed to me by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] with the request that it be received and printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can not hear the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. VEST. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is to strike out all from the word "or," in line 11, on the second page of the bill, down to and including the words "in respect of the same," in line 30 of the same page, and to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out:

Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that such vessels or fishermen are obstructed by Canadian authorities in their free use on their way to the deep sea fisheries of such easements and rights in Canadian territory or territorial waters as belong to them by ancient ownership sanctioned by treaty.

The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is to insert at the end of line 44 the words:

And also, if he thinks proper, to prohibit entrance into the United States from Canada of any engines, rolling stock, or cars with any goods that may be contained therein.

His next amendment is to insert after "vessels," in line 51, the words:

Engines, rolling stock, cars.

I offer upon my own motion as an addition to the bill what I send to the Chair. I offer all these amendments together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the first question is on the amendment now pending. That must be disposed of before the Senator's amendments can be received.

Mr. VEST. But I want these printed before we adjourn, and I want the Senate to understand what the amendments are.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he let the pending amendment, which is merely to phraseology, be adopted.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Line 11, after the word "rights," it is proposed to insert: "Or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. HOAR was, in line 21, after the word "thereof," to insert: "Or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. HOAR was, in line 30, after the word "same," to insert: "Or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question, objection being made.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I desire to say that this is a bill of a committee and we are putting in here what we do not know anything about, affecting treaty obligations between this country and Great Britain, and somebody just comes in and proposes what is adopted without being explained. I say I do object. To-morrow or next day or next year is time enough to make treaties with Great Britain, and especially if we are to accept just what one Senator shall say here to-day. Next year is time enough. It took us many more years than one to make ourselves an American Senate, and it would seem to me that it is time enough even next year to make treaties by bill. I do object.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, has the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The question is on the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. Now I submit my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the amendment read now?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I want to take the floor on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Line 11, after the word "rights," strike out:

or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect to the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof.

And insert in lieu thereof:

or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that such vessels or fishermen are obstructed by Canadian authority in their free use on their way to the deep-sea fisheries of such easements and rights in Canadian territory or territorial waters as belong to them by ancient ownership, sanctioned by treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the other amendments read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Take them one at a time.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it goes without saying that if the rights of the humblest citizen of the United States should be attacked by any foreign power there would exist a unanimity of sentiment on the part of the people of the United States that those rights should be protected, that the glory and honor of the American people must be preserved. As the Senator from Alabama in front of me [Mr. MORGAN] has very well said, there would be no geographical or sectional differences if any such issue were ever made, and it would be found that the men who were arrayed against each other in battle very lately would stand together in solid phalanx in defense of these rights and of this honor. All this talk which runs beneath any such thing as a war with other peoples of the world is premature. It is enough for us to meet any such contingency when it is absolutely impossible to avoid it.

As for myself, I can say that I have no such prejudice in favor of England or her institutions as prevents me now from declaring that I would not hesitate one single instant as to the consequences if the issue of individual rights or national honor should be presented to this Congress. But it becomes us to consider well every step that we take in regard to this most serious complication. Whatever else may be said about England and her people, they have in their veins the same blood of conquest and aggression that runs through our own veins; and when it comes to a question of right and of English honor, I am not afraid to say, in spite of any misconception or prejudice in this country against England, that no people that ever lived in history have been more valiant or would suffer more to defend their rights or their national honor. We are their children, and when we speak of spirit and determination on our own part, let us admit the fact that it comes from that same blood which has not run dry.

What is this issue before the Senate of the United States? It comes from a clause in the treaty of 1818, which reads as follows:

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

Here are four specific purposes for which American fishermen and fishing vessels may enter the Canadian ports. "American fishermen shall be admitted" for the purpose of purchasing wood, for obtaining water, for shelter, for repairing damages, "and for no other purpose whatever." The contention of Great Britain is simply that the right to obtain bait in these ports of the British dominions in North America is not included within this concession. I think myself that they stick in the bark. I think that the admirable letter of Minister Phelps on this question is sufficient to show that there should be a broad and catholic construction of such a treaty between friendly nations. But it is useless for us to disguise the fact that, if she chooses to do so, England is not without some pretense of right in putting the construction on this treaty that she does.

Mr. Bayard says in his admirable argument that the mode of fishing has been changed until now the deep-sea fishery is alone valuable to American fishermen, and, properly speaking, between friendly nations it ought to be held that American fishermen could purchase bait under this clause in order to go out to the deep sea. England, on the other hand, makes the contention that no such construction should be given. Our side of this question is admirably presented in the letter of Mr. Phelps, from which I shall now read:

Recurring, then, to the only real question in the case, whether the vessel is to be forfeited for purchasing—

Speaking of the David J. Adams—

for purchasing bait of an inhabitant of Nova Scotia, to be used in lawful fishing, it may be readily admitted that if the language of the treaty of 1818—is to be interpreted literally, rather than according to its spirit and plain intent, a vessel engaged in fishing would be prohibited from entering a Canadian port "for any purpose whatever" except to obtain wood or water, to repair damages, or to seek shelter. Whether it would be liable to the extreme penalty of confiscation for a breach of this prohibition in a trifling and harmless instance might be quite another question.

Such a literal construction is best refuted by considering its preposterous consequences. If a vessel enters a port to post a letter, or send a telegram, or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness, or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood, or pestilence, it would, upon this construction, be held to violate the treaty stipulations maintained between two enlightened maritime and most friendly nations, whose ports are freely open to each other in all other places and under all other circumstances. If a vessel is not engaged in fishing she may enter all ports, but if employed in fishing, not denied to be lawful, she is excluded, though on the most innocent errand. She may buy water, but not food or medicine; wood, but not coal. She may repair rigging, but not purchase a new rope, though the inhabitants are desirous to sell it. If she even entered the port (having no other business) to report herself to the custom-house, as the vessel in question is now seized for not doing, she would be equally within the interdiction of the treaty. If it be said these are extreme instances of violation of the treaty not likety to be insisted on, I reply that no one of them is more extreme than the one relied upon in this case.

I am persuaded that your lordship—

This is addressed to the secretary of foreign affairs of Great Britain——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. What is his name—"lordship?"——

Mr. VEST. This is a letter to the British foreign secretary—will, upon reflection, concur with me that an intention so narrow, and in its result so unreasonable and so unfair, is not to be attributed to the high contracting parties who entered into this treaty.

It seems to me clear that the treaty must be construed in accordance with those ordinary and well-settled rules applicable to all written instruments, which without such salutary assistance must constantly fail of their purpose. By these rules the letter often gives way to the intent, or rather is only used to ascertain the intent.

The whole document will be taken together, and will be considered in connection with the attendant circumstances, the situation of the parties, and the object in view, and thus the literal meaning of an isolated clause is often shown not to be the meaning really understood or intended.

Upon these principles of construction the meaning of the clause in question does not seem doubtful. It is a treaty of friendship and not of hostility. Its object was to define and protect the relative rights of the people of the two countries in these fisheries. not to establish a system of non-intercourse or the means of mutual and unnecessary annoyance. It should be judged in view of the general rules of international comity and of maritime intercourse and usage, and its restrictions considered in the light of the purposes they were designed to serve.

Thus regarded it appears to me clear that the words "for no other purpose whatever," as employed in the treaty, mean no other purposes inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty, or prejudicial to the interests of the provinces or their inhabitants, and were not intended to prevent the entry of American fishing vessels into Canadian ports for innocent and mutually beneficial purposes, or unnecessarily to restrict the free and friendly intercourse customary between all civilized maritime nations, and especially between the United States and Great Britain. Such, I cannot but believe, is the construction that would be placed upon this treaty by any enlightened court of justice.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if that dispatch is between the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have read this extract from this most admirable letter of our minister to England to show that upon the one hand Great Britain asks for a literal interpretation of the clause of the treaty which I have read, and Mr. Phelps—and I take it no one here who has read this correspondence will claim that he is not exigent for our national honor in this whole matter—Mr. Phelps is compelled to admit that a literal construction would bring about the results which England claims; but he says in a broader and catholic construction between the two great English-speaking nations of the world, considering our ancestry, all the ties that bind us together, and even the prejudices that forced us apart, it is unreasonable to put the literal construction, but there should be a broader construction.

Mr. President, it is not for me to so entirely go outside of this language as to claim that Great Britain has brutally and ruthlessly, and without any show of reason, trampled upon the rights of American citizens. I am not here as the apologist of Great Britain or of her institutions. A paper yesterday did me the honor to say that somewhere, at some time, I had offered an amendment to a bill or to some pending treaty, in order to expedite the taking of dynamiters abroad for trial within the English dominions. As I never heard of any such proposition, and as the first information I ever had in regard to it came from this newspaper, and as I may be permitted to say all my feelings and opinions run directly contrary to the current which this paper undertook to point out for me, I wish to disclaim any such feeling as the paper ascribed to me, or as others have ascribed to me. I do not believe Great Britain wants any war with this country, or is attempting to thrust one upon us.

Great Britain to-day—I say it without being her apologist—is located exactly and situated precisely as was this country in regard to the difficulties upon the Rio Grande which brought about the Mexican war. Every intelligent man knows how local prejudice and contiguity fan into flame differences, which, in themselves, would be susceptible of adjustment did not localities bring about a conflict. This colony of Great Britain, largely interested in fishing, is claiming a construction of this treaty in the bark and against the spirit, as Mr. Phelps says. I have no doubt the colonial legislature, which, like our legislatures, is peculiarly subject to local feeling and prejudice, has resorted to a system of legislation which can not be defended, and which we can not for one single instant permit to enter into this controversy as to the construction of this treaty of 1818. But England can not afford to go to war with the United States. Of all the calamities that could befall either country in the shape of a collision, war with Great Britain would be the greatest to the United States and to that nationality.

I have said that not for an instant could we submit to the contention that the legislation or the legislatures of the British dominions in North America could enter into the construction of the treaty of 1818. I find in this correspondence, which breathes throughout, I am glad to say, on the part of the representatives of the United States, from the Secretary of State himself down to the lowest official, a high, dignified, and firm spirit, such as becomes the people of the United States and their position, an admirable argument, which, it seems to me, effectually disposes of all pretenses that we are to be governed for a single instant by the legislation of Canada in regard to the construction of the treaty of 1818. The English authorities claim that until the pending litigation consequent on the seizure of American shipping vessels by the Canadian tribunals should be determined, this difference in the construction of the treaty of 1818 should not be considered. In reply to that Mr. Phelps says:

The proposition of Her Majesty's Government amounts to this, that before the United States can obtain consideration of their complaint that the Canadian authorites without justification have seized and are proceeding to confiscate American vessels, the result of the proceedings in the Canadian courts, instituted by the captors as the means of the seizures, must be awaited, and the decision of that tribunal on the international questions involved obtained.

The intrepretation of a treaty when it becomes the subject of discussion between two governments is not, I respectfully insist, to be settled by the judicial tribunals of either. That would be placing its construction in the hands of one of the parties to it. It can only be interpreted for such a purpose by the mutual consideration and agreement which were necessary to make it. Questions between individuals arising upon the terms of a treaty may be for the courts to which they resort to adjust.

Questions between nations as to national rights secured by treaty are of a very different character and must be solved in another way.

The United States Government is no party to the proceedings instituted by the British authorities in Canada. Nor can it consent to become a party. The proceedings themselves are what the United States complain of as unauthorized as well as unfriendly. It would be inconsistent with the dignity of a sovereign power to become a party to such proceedings, or to seek redress in any way in the courts of another country for what it claims to be the violation of treaty stipulations by the authorities of that country.

Still less could it consent to be made indirectly a party to the suits by being required to await the result of such defense as the individuals whose property is implicated may be able and may think proper to set up.

Litigation of that sort may be indefinitely prolonged. Meanwhile fresh seizures of American vessels upon similar grounds are to be expected, for which redress would in like manner await the decisions of the local tribunals, whose jurisdiction the captors invoke and the United States Government denies.

Nor need it be again pointed out how different may be the question involved between the Governments from that which these proceedings raise in the Canadian courts. Courts in such cases do not administer treaties. They administer only the statutes that are passed in pursuance of treaties. If a statute contravene the provisions of a treaty British courts are nevertheless bound by the statute. And if, on the other hand, there is a treaty stipulation which no statute gives the means of enforcing, the court can not enforce it.

Although the United States Government insists that there is no British or colonial act authorizing the seizures complained of, if the British courts should nevertheless find such authority in any existing statute, the question whether the statute itself or the construction given it is warranted by the treaty would still remain. And also the still higher question, whether if the strict technical reading of the treaty might be thought to warrant such a result, it is one which ought to be enforced between sovereign and friendly nations acting in the spirit of the treaty.

The United States Government must therefore insist that, irrespective of the future result of the Canadian legal proceedings, the authority and propriety of which is the subject of dispute, and without waiting their conclusion, it is to Her Majesty's Government it must look for redress and satisfaction for the transactions in question, and for such instructions to the colonial authority as will prevent their repetition.

I have read this for a double purpose; to show the real points at issue, which, it seems, to me have not been sufficiently set forth in the course of this discussion, and in the second place, to show that our representative abroad has been true to his country and has asserted the full measure of the rights of the American people, and not only individual rights but our national honor. The negotiations are still pending, as we are informed by the Secretary of State, with the hope that they may come to a favorable adjustment.

This measure now comes to us, for which I expect to vote, in the nature of a proposition for a commercial embargo. It is, if not war, the half-sister of war. We know, in the history of this country, war was the result of the embargo which cast its shadow over the last years of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and upon which he vainly relied to prevent a war with Great Britain. That embargo ruined our own people, and the war of 1812 burst upon the country with a British army that ravaged our borders as the vessels of Great Britain ravaged our commerce upon the seas.

This power in this bill is the most extraordinary declaration of war known to civilized nations, and this bill contains most extraordinary phrases, the meaning of which I do not pretend to give. It is said here that the President of the United States shall do so and so, that it shall be his duty within his discretion to declare this embargo against commerce; it shall be his duty within his discretion. What is meant by that "discretion" I leave to the able Senator from Vermont in charge of this bill. If the President has "discretion" why point out his "duty?" If we say to him it is his "duty," why give to him the "discretion?" It is "his duty within his discretion" to put this embargo upon the commerce of the United States with this foreign nation.

But that is not all. I stated that I should vote for the bill, and I vote for it, I am frank to say, because it contains the single provision that the President of the United States shall have discretion in regard to this matter. I would not vote for it as a mandatory bill. I would not take the responsibility of saying that the President of the United States should declare this embargo when these negotiations are still pending and when we know the full result of what a war with Great Britain must mean. It is well enough to talk in a rhetorical style about a war with Great Britain. The world in arms can not conquer this country upon our own soil—nor five such worlds in arms, it may be said without exaggeration. The United States united are invincible in any such struggle as that. But in a maritime war, who could answer for the result? Who wants to risk the gage of battle in any such fashion as that? Who wants to invite such a contest, no matter how high his patriotism or what his military ardor? Who can think for one minute of the enormous loss, not only of life, but of property, which must follow from any such struggle, situated as we now are?

But this bill has in it a clause to which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] desires me to call attention.

> Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British Dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, &c.

This clause puts the United States simply on the basis of a favored nation in regard to this fishery question. I understand that the position and contention of the United States Government heretofore has been, and is to-day, that we are a co-owner of Great Britain of the fishing rights, except as they may be modified by treaty; that we have always denied that we stand upon the footing of a foreign and favored nation, but that we were, together with Great Britain, upon an equality, and that there was an equal right in the citizens of the two countries to claim these fishery rights on the coast of Canada.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Missouri will allow me in that connection to say that there are two kinds of vessels that are mentioned here: one fishermen entered as such, and the other fishermen with commercial licenses to touch and trade. The clause proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Maryland relates to vessels authorized to touch and trade; and vessels that are authorized to touch and trade in that commercial sense must be considered by all the nations with whom we trade as being on the basis of the most favored nations, unless we admit some inferiority.

To strike out that class of vessels is simply to emasculate this bill. It takes entirely out of the bill and out of the remedial power placed in the hands of the President all that class of fishing vessels, which, being such, are also made commercial vessels by the license to touch and trade—the license of our own custom-house.

So the Senator will see that the reference to the "favored nation" in this bill is not in connection with fishermen as such, or any particular rights we have under the treaty of 1818, but relates simply to vessels that are fishermen having also the right to touch and trade, as to which we must acknowledge that if we have any rights at all, we have the rights of the most favored nation.

Mr. VEST. I put the construction upon that clause in connection with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland. One of the very first points of contention between the United States and Great Britain is that under the treaty England claims that these vessels did not have the right to go into Canadian ports except for the four specified purposes named, and the contention on the part of the Government of the United States is, under the broader construction of that treaty, that these four specified purposes include the larger purpose of going there for the purpose of trading in such necessary articles as they might need.

So far from wanting to put the United States in an inferior position, I am satisfied that the Senator from Maryland has directly the opposite intention, and he is afraid that in the language of this section as it now stands the United States may abdicate a position heretofore asserted at all times that she regards herself as one of the joint occupants of these fishing rights, the right of the two countries to be limited only by treaty made between them.

The other amendment of the Senator from Maryland inserts, in addition to the goods which may be placed under the operation of this embargo, and which may be prohibited from passing through our territory, "cars and engines," for the purpose of enlarging the provisions of the bill. The Senator, however, is now present in his seat, and I will not take any more time in doing what he can so much better do than myself.

Now, as to the amendment I have offered, I hope I may be permitted without being held amenable to the criticism that I am following the dictation of any Cabinet officer, to allude to the recommendation which is in the President's message and in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, which is to the effect that a commission is recommended for the purpose of perpetuating testimony or proof as to these outrages upon American fishermen within the last year, or since the 1st of January, 1885.

If we desire to demonstrate to the English Government our intention to protect our own citizens and to see that all the rights given by treaty are effectually preserved, it seems to me that the most effective plan to evidence our sincerity would be by making plain the testimony sustaining the claims for redress to American citizens for damages already suffered. This legislation proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations is as to the future, and there may be no other outrage perpetrated in the future. The past is finished—it is complete. We all heard to-day the details stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] of the outrages inflicted upon American fishing vessels by the authorities and people of the Dominion. No higher duty can be imposed upon this Congress than to see that our citizens who have thus suffered have the courts opened, and not only the courts, but that they have the proof ready for the time when we carry out the purpose announced by our State Department of demanding full pecuniary reparation for the damages thus inflicted upon the American people.

I am glad to say that while I have differed widely from Secretary Bayard in the past on many public questions, I readily indorse every word he has said in his correspondence with the British authorities on this vexed question, and I am glad to say that, in the conclusion of every one of his letters reciting these outrages, he has notified the British authorities that the American Government will expect full and complete pecuniary compensation to its citizens for these wrongs inflicted upon them.

What is the first step in that direction? Men die, evidence dies, documents are wasted and destroyed. This evidence must be put in some tangible and permanent shape, so that when the time comes, spoken of by the State Department, the evidence may be forthcoming to prove the amount of damages and the circumstances under which those damages were incurred. It seems to me that here is an opportunity to show our sincerity and to evidence to our own citizens the fact that we intend to protect them and see that they secure their rights.

I know it may be said that the formation of a commission, which is the purpose of the amendment I have offered, to proceed to such place as the Secretary of State may indicate, to take this testimony and attest it and certify it to the State Department, is foreign and alien to the purpose of the bill pending before the Senate. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me germane, intimately germane to the very purpose we have now in view.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator what better that would be than the voluntary affidavits these people have already filed in the State Department?

Mr. VEST. Infinitely better.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly it will not bind Great Britain unless she assents to the commission.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Colorado is a lawyer. Does he ask me the difference between an affidavit taken before, probably, some justice of the peace in a country village by men inexperienced in the matter of taking testimony, and the full and complete testimony taken by a lawyer. What are these affidavits? It is impossible to take anything else but ex parte statements in the Department.

Mr. TELLER. One has as much force as the other. You may get more details by a commission.

Mr. VEST. Am I claiming as a sane man that there is any peculiar force about testimony taken in this way? It is simply to perpetuate the testimony. We are claiming now damages and hereafter will bring it to a direct issue, and how do we have proof of them? The affidavits sent here by mail. We want when we meet the authorities of Great Britain to say, "Here, we have taken the proof; we have cross-examined the witnesses; we bring here now the testimony establishing our claims."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Missouri whether he remembers any instance in the history of this country in which a similar commission has been formed to take testimony for claims, or whether the uniform course has not been always by a constant practice for people who claim to have been wronged by any foreign government or its people to file in the Department of State as a matter of course what are called protests and proofs, and without the expense of a fresh lot of officers and a fresh enginery for accomplishing that object?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course protests may be filed, and they may not be filed. Nobody will undertake to say here that they are filed in all these cases—the long category of cases read to-day by the Senator from Maine. We know as intelligent men, to say nothing of many of us being lawyers, that the time must come when the question of testimony, or evidence, to speak more properly, will become a vital one as between the Government of Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator does not answer the first part of my question as to whether he remembers any instance in the history of this country.

Mr. VEST. I believe such a commission was established in regard to the French spoliation claims. I know a commission was sent abroad to procure evidence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was after we had provided for the Court of Claims trying against our own country those claims.

Mr. VEST. Why did we send at our own expense to procure testimony, documentary and oral? We sent a commissioner abroad for that very purpose, and an act was passed by Congress to authorize it. But the Senator asks me for precedents. If the Congress had looked for the precedents always, I know of several commissions in this country that never would have existed. I recollect one in 1876 or 1877 that had no precedent, in which the Senator from Vermont played a very conspicuous part. Then the Senator with his eloquence and logic was found on the other side of the question of precedent, and he convinced the Congress of the United States that no precedent was necessary, but he manufactured a case to suit certain political purposes at that time, and he sneered and laughed at the idea of precedent. Lawyers and statesmen in the Congress of the United States set out upon a voyage of discovery on their own account and manufactured a tribunal of which the like was never seen in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.

No, Mr. President, something else must be alleged here except the want of precedents. This is a plain, practical, business question. We have made this demand of Great Britain, and we propose to enforce it. If we delay now in this matter and allow the witnesses to die, the documents to be lost, it will be found to be simply rhetoric and "leather and prunella," and no facts.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say anything that by any sort of construction shall reflect on the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I do submit that with this record of the question so well discussed on the part of the Secretary of State and our minister to England and every subordinate official, it would be nothing but parliamentary comity for this Congress to consider the only recommendation that is made by the State Department in regard to this whole matter.

Understand me, sir, I am not antagonizing the bill brought here by the Committee on Foreign Relations; I would even enlarge it as to some of its provisions; but I say when we are disposing of this question let us dispose of all of it. Let us not make promises and provisions for the future; let us provide for the damages of the past.

These two subjects are germane and appropriate to each other. If we create this commission to provide for the evidence we are demanding to secure the rights of American citizens by reason of outrages already perpetrated; in the same breath we say to the British authorities, "If this practice is continued, if these treaty stipulations are violated in the future, we give you fair warning and full notice of what the course of the Government of the United States will be." This is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of my honorable friend from Vermont to one point where, perhaps, the insertion of a word in the bill is necessary. In line 47 it provides that the President may qualify, limit, and renew his proclamation from time to time. The proclamation is to become, of course, the law of the land, and the violation of it is to be made a penal offense by the last sentence in the bill. It may be that the proclamation of the President might be required for some not very grave or permanent injury, and some satisfaction or assurance that the thing would not be repeated might be given to the President so that before another session of Congress he would desire to withdraw the proclamation altogether—to rescind it. I suppose that is intended by the phrase already used, but as it might be doubted whether the words "qualify" and "limit" would be sufficient to authorize an entire withdrawal or rescinding of the proclamation, I suggest to the Senator to put in, after the word "may," the word "rescind," so as to read:

May rescind, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It means precisely the same thing. I do not care whether you have the word in or out.

Mr. HOAR. The words "qualify" and "limit" do not form a total revocation as ordinarily used. I move to insert the word "rescind" after the word "may," in line 47.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to the part proposed to be stricken out, and is in order. It will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 47, after the word "may," insert the word "rescind."

Mr. HOAR. I will substitute the word "revoke" at the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. EDMUNDS. All I have to say about that in asking for the yeas and nays is that it is a pretty substantial emasculation of the proposition that is proposed to be stricken out. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. What amendment is pending?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The first one offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it the amendment proposing a commission to perpetuate testimony?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be again read. I have been misinformed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It proposes to strike out certain clauses and insert others.

Mr. TELLER. Let us hear what is to be inserted.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the Secretary read what is to be striken out and what is to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, after the word "rights," it is proposed to strike out:

or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places, or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port of ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof.

or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that such vessels or fishermen are obstructed by Canadian authority in their free use on their way to the deep-sea fisheries of such easements and rights in Canadian territory or territorial waters as belong to them by ancient ownership sanctioned by treaty.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks upon this question, but it is late.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will allow me, if it is the intention to debate the bill at much length hereafter, it appears to me that it would be better to adjourn until morning. The matter is one of great importance; the bill has been recently reported, and there has been no disposition to delay action. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont whether it would not be well to postpone action until to-morrow.

Mr. GORMAN. I should very much prefer that course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With only thirty days left, with no appropriation bills yet passed, and great masses of other important public business, I feel it to be a duty to ask the Senate to finish this business to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Vermont——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GORMAN. I desire to submit some remarks, if we are to go on.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. In the amendment pending I do not understand what is called "Canadian authority."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator yield to me to make a motion?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not understand the question of Canadian authority. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland if he is going to discuss it. Do I apprehend you, sir?

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to submit a few remarks upon the pending question. I have been engaged practically all day, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations knows, and I would much prefer, if the Senator from Vermont will consent to let the matter go over, to submit my remarks to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Maryland will yield to me, after the statement he has made I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). The pair which I made with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Beck,	Colquitt,	Harris,	Vest,
Berry,	Eustis,	Payne,	Walthall,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Whitthorne.
Call,	Gorman,	Riddleberger,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Hampton,	Vance,

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Mitchell of Oregon,	Spooner,
Blair,	Evarts,	Morgan,	Teller,
Brown,	Frye,	Morrill,	Williams,
Cheney,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,
Cullom,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Mahone,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—25.

Bowen,	Hale,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Butler,	Harrison,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Ingalls,	Miller,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Jones of Arkansas,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Wilson of Md.
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
George,	Kenna,	Sewell,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. As I stated a few minutes ago, not knowing positively that this measure would come up for consideration to-day, as my entire time during the day has been taken up in other public duties, I would much prefer if the Senate had permitted me to address it to-morrow instead of this afternoon. However, the Senate having voted not to adjourn, I shall proceed and do the best I can.

Mr. President, our title to the northeast fisheries is not one of grant from Great Britain but of conquest by international right by which the title accrues to ourselves. Before the division of the British empire, which was inaugurated by the Declaration of Independence and consummated by the peace of 1783, the fisheries were held by that empire in entirety. There was good reason why it should have been so. There is no question that the seamen who formed the greater part of the British naval forces which wrested the fisheries from France came from the New England provinces.

The fishermen of Massachusetts, which then included Maine, of New Hampshire, of Rhode Island, aided by not a few from New York, and even from New Jersey and Virginia and Maryland, entered into the British service at that time with the same zeal and efficiency which they subsequently showed when battling against Great Britain in the was of 1812. The hardy privateersmen and sailors in our men-of-war, who, drawn from the Atlantic seaboard, showed such energy and valor in the naval contests which marked the war of 1812, did not exceed in these attributes their predecessors who formed part of the naval contingent by which the fisheries were won from France. It never was conceived in those days by the fishermen who fought the battles and, afterwards, in their fishing boats, enjoyed the spoils, that these fisheries did not belong to the whole sea-faring and fishing population of British North America taken as a whole.

How was it, then, after the Declaration of Independence? Now I maintain that during the whole Revolutionary war it was never questioned to the United States, nor, as far as I learn, ever contested in Great Britain, that the fishermen of the United States continued to hold in these fisheries the title which they had previously possessed. I find a striking illustration of this in a letter of Chancellor Livingston, the first Secretary of State who was formally appointed to that office by the Continental Congress. The letter is addressed to Dr. Franklin, and is dated January 7, 1782. It is found in Wharton's Digest of International Law, volume 2, section 301, and is as follows:

The arguments on which the people of America found their claim to fish on the banks of Newfoundland arise, first, from their having once formed a part of the British empire, in which state they always enjoyed as fully as the people of Britain themselves the right of fishing on those banks. They have shared in all the wars for the extenson of that right, and Britain could with no more justice have excluded them from the enjoyment of it (even supposing that one nation could possess it to the exclusion of another) while they formed a part of that empire than they could exclude the people of London or Bristol. If so, the only inquiry is, how have we lost this right? If we were tenants in common with Great Britain while united with her, we still continue so unless by our own act we have relinquished our title. Had we parted with mutual consent, we should doubtless have made partition of our common rights by treaty. But the oppressions of Great Britain forced us to a separation (which must be admitted, or we have no right to be independent); and it can not certainly be contended that those oppressions abridged our rights or gave new ones to Britain. Our rights, then, are not invalidated by this separation, more particularly as we have kept up our claim from the commencement of the war, and assigned the attempt of Great Britain to exclude us from the fisheries as one of the causes of our recurring to arms.

Chancellor Livingston, as is well known, was a leading member of the Democratic party. He belonged to a very powerful and distinguished family in New York which had allied themselves with that party. He had been chancellor of the State of New York prior to his acceptance of the office of Secretary of State. He was an intimate personal friend of Jefferson, by whom he was subsequently selected to go as minister to France, where, in connection with Mr. Monroe, he negotiated the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana. His views in respect to the fisheries, therefore, may be taken as representing, more or less, the views of that great school of statesmen of which he was so distinguished a member.

But it was not by these statesmen alone that our joint ownership of the fisheries was maintained. Mr. Rufus King was a well-known Federalist, and was at the same time a man of high patriotism, of great intellectual power, and of extraordinary acquaintance with our foreign relations. Whatever may have been the shadow cast upon some of the ultra members of the Federal party in respect to their relations with England, no such shadow ever fell upon Rufus King. Still, at the same time, he was elected as a Federalist Senator from New York, both in 1789 and in 1818. It is a very interesting fact that Mr. King, unquestionably connected with the Federalists, a party which was supposed to be at least not inimical to Great Britain, took very much the same position in a speech delivered in the Senate on April 3, 1818, as did Chancellor Livingston.

Fisheries—

He said—

those of the ocean, not within the territorial limits of any nation, are free to all men who have not renounced their rights; those on the coasts and bays of the provinces conquered in America from France were acquired by the common sword and mingled blood of Americans and Englishmen. Members of the same empire, we, with them, had a common right to these fisheries; and in the division of the empire England confirmed our title without condition or limitation—a title equally irrevocable with those of our boundaries or of our independence itself.

We have, therefore, leading men of both parties uniting in the position that the fisheries were held by us in common as a matter of right.

Nor is this all. On November 3, 1818, Mr. Cæsar A. Rodney, a very eminent lawyer, who had been Attorney-General under Mr. Jefferson, and was then a Senator from Delaware, was consulted confidentially by Mr. Monroe, then President of the United States, as to our rights in the fisheries. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the patriotism, wisdom, high honor, and patient interest of Mr. Monroe in the investigation of the questions submitted to him as President. It is enough here to say that after taking the opinion of Mr. Rodney he indorsed it and placed it among his private papers; and there is no question whatever, from Mr. Monroe's own notes in the Department of State and from the contemporaneous memoirs of Mr. John Quincy Adams, that we are entitled to conclude that this opinion of Mr. Rodney was accepted by Mr. Monroe as giving the true view of the fishery question.

Now, what was Mr. Rodney's position? It simply reaffirmed, and did so expressly, the views taken by Mr. King and Chancellor Livingston; and these views were afterward vindicated in a pamphlet of exceeding ability published by Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State in Mr. Monroe's administration, entitled "The Fisheries and the Mississippi." We have, therefore, a consensus of the highest authorities to which we can appeal, maintaining the position that the ownership of the United States fishermen in the fisheries was held by them as a matter of right.

The next inquiry is, "How far this right was divested by the treaty of 1783." I do not propose to discuss this treaty in detail. I desire simply to say that it was not a treaty which granted independence to the United States. Independence we did not owe to any grant or concession from Great Britain, unwilling as such grant or concession may have been. The treaty of peace, on the contrary, was a treaty which recognized independence as a fact. It was already won when the treaty was signed. The treaty was simply a treaty of partition; it simply said that the British empire, which hitherto comprised Great Britain and British North America, should be divided. One part was to retain the old title of Great Britain; the other part of it, constituting the United States, was to take the new title of the United States.

Here I beg to remark that such partitions of empires are not unknown in history. Sweden, Denmark, and Norway have been united and disunited by treaties of union and of partition. When such treaties of partition are made, each of the two separate sovereignties carries with it its own territories as previously designated, and all the incidents, easements, prerogatives, and emoluments of such territories. The fisheries, at the time of the peace, were as much an extension of the territory of the United States as they were an extension of the territory of British North America, as reconstituted. It may have been a singular conformation of territory which enabled the United States to fling its arms northward and to take in these seas as part of a territory to be held in common with the parent State; but it was no more a singular conformation of territory than was that of Prussia as it existed on the map in those days. But, however this may be, the waters embracing the fisheries belonged as much to the United States at the treaty of 1783, and by the terms of that treaty, as they belonged to Great Britain. Hence, under that treaty, our fishermen have just as much right to go into the territorial waters and use the shores as incident to fishing as have the British subjects. The treaty itself expressly states this. Article III of the treaty is as follows:

ART. III. It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also, in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish. And also, that the inhabitants of the United States hall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island); and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

It will be observed here that the rights specified in the treaty are not granted by it. The treaty declares that "the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy" these rights. The rights were theirs before, and their continuance under certain minor limitations is recognized by the treaty.

The next question is one of very great interest, "Whether these rights were destroyed by the war of 1812—whether that war had the effect of abrogating this portion of the treaty." There is no doubt as to the position that a treaty which is the cause of a war may be regarded as substituted by the war which it causes. Nor can it be questioned that when a war exists in respect to a particular claim, that claim may be considered as settled by the result of the war. But these positions do not apply to questions of boundaries unless they are the subjects of conquest, or unless they are disposed of by the subsequent treaty of pacification.

The war of 1812 and the peace of 1815 no more affected the boundaries of the fishing rights of the United States at sea than they did the boundary of the territorial rights of the United States on land. Both, in fact, were territorial rights. The United States held territorial rights in the fisheries as continuous in common. They had territorial rights on the shore in entirety, and the war of 1812 and the treaty of Ghent no more affected the one than it did the other. I think this is clear when we recollect that the treaty of peace was not merely a treaty of partition, but it was a treaty for the establishment of reciprocal easements and privileges on which the intercourse between the two sovereignties thus separated was to rest. The reciprocities in question may be thus classified: First, the rights of the United States fishermen to the fisheries; secondly, the rights of British subjects to retain their estates in the United States without risk of confiscation; thirdly, the right of British subjects to traverse the United States, as lawfully developed subsequently in Jay's treaty, and as afterward guaranteed in treaties by Great Britain and in legislation by the United States.

We may, therefore, regard the pacific relation of the United States and Great Britain as resting on what might be called a three-leg table. It rested on three distinct props, which were integral, and which went to the essence of the sovereignty of both the two sections of the British Empire as divided. It will be impossible to say that the war of 1812 destroyed one of these props without saying it destroyed the other two. If, however, this were conceded it would be equivalent to saying that the war of 1812 and the treaty of Ghent destroyed the corporate existence of not merely the United States but of Great Britain. Certainly in the war of 1812 it can not be pretended that the United States came off the worse. It can, therefore, be no more pretended that the war of 1812 and the treaty of Ghent swept away the territorial rights of the United States than that it swept away the territorial rights of Great Britain. If it did not sweep away the territorial rights of Great Britain, it did not sweep away the territorial rights of the United States.

We have an interesting proof of the way in which this question is viewed both in the United States and in Great Britain in adjudications by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the master of the rolls of Great Britain. In the case of McIlvain vs. Cox, 4 Cranch, 209, in 1807, the position that the treaty of peace was a treaty of partition was recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, and this case has been repeatedly confirmed by the same august tribunal. In 1830 the question of the effect of the war of 1812 and the treaty of Ghent upon the reciprocities established by the treaty of peace and by Jay's treaty came up before the master of the rolls in England, Sir John Leach. It was there held by him that—which had subsisted between Great Britain and America when they formed one empire led to the introduction of the ninth section of the treaty of 1794, and made it highly reasonable that the subjects of the two parts of the divided empire should, notwithstanding the separation, be protected in the mutual enjoyment of their landed property; and the privileges of natives being reciprocally given not only to the actual possessors of lands but to their heirs and assigns, it is a reasonable construction that it was the intention of the treaty that the operation of the treaty should be permanent, and not depend upon the continuance of a state of peace.

The relations—

To quote his own words—

The reciprocal rights of British subjects and American citizens to hold property in each other's country was therefore one of the rights, according to the master of the rolls, which were not divested by the war of 1812 or the treaty of Ghent.

Now, it is an interesting fact that the question before Sir John Leach, in the case of Sutton vs. Sutton, 1st Rus. and M., 675 (which is the case in which this decision was made), was argued by very eminent counsel, and with great elaborateness and power. From the decision of Sir John Leach, however, no appeal was taken, and, viewing the importance of the question at issue and the ability of the counsel engaged for the worsted party, it is impossible to view this fact in any other light than as an admission that the decision was one which it was not advisable to contest.

I said a moment ago that the amicable relations of Great Britain and the United States rested upon a tripod of reciprocities. First, the fisheries; secondly, the reciprocal rights to hold property; thirdly, the right of transit through each other's dominions. I turn now to the latter right, and I view it as it embodies grants from the United States, or from States which are part of the United States, to British railroads and British vessels of transit through the territory of the United States. Let me call your attention in the first place to lake transit. No one can glance at the lakes without seeing how immense is the advantage obtained by Canada from the free transit of them, and this free transit we have freely given. Vessels going from one Canadian port to another can pass through our waters, can obtain succor in our ports, can visit those ports for shelter, and this without molestation of any kind.

But it is with our land transit that we are now mainly concerned. I do not hesitate to say that the growth of Canada, great as it has been, has been largely dependent upon the facilities of transit granted to her by the United States. It is no discredit to Canada, it is no depreciation of Canadian enterprise that such should be the case. We possess interior lines; we have a more benignant climate. There are periods in which Canadian roads are impassable, in which ours are open, and in such periods the only method of transit between specific Canadian points is through the United States; and then, without any undue adulation of the United States or the people of the United States, I may venture to say that the first rush of enterprise and the first outflow of capital toward the Northwest has been through the southern and not through the northern side of the Canadian border.

By us the first trans-continental railroads were built. By us, far in advance of Canada, were railroads constructed along the northern border-land. Canada undoubtedly has moved westward, but she has done so leaning on us. It was our roads that carried her laborers to their destination. It was through our avenues of communication that assistance was given by which parallel avenues of communication were opened on the Canada side. Even now the shortest method of reaching the Atlantic coast from Central Canada is through the extension of the Grand Trunk Railroad, which traverses the State of Maine and has its terminus at Portland; and while the lake navigation in Canada is closed, as it is a large portion of the year, the Canadian Pacific has no method of connecting the eastern and western provinces of Canada except by the railroads of the United States.

I said a moment ago that our pacific relations with Great Britain rest on a tripod, or a three-leg table, to adopt the more homely expression with which I began. The first, I beg to recall, is the fisheries; the second, reciprocal enjoyment of titles, and the third, right of transit. Now, the question becomes a very serious one and requires the gravest consideration. If you knock away one of the legs of this three-leg table it falls. If Great Britain permits Canada, in a moment of petulance, to prevent our fishermen from the enjoyment of their unquestionable rights in the northeastern waters, it is impossible to see how the system of reciprocity in other respects can stand. The one is dependent on the others. If the fisheries go, the others go. If we are to be excluded from our natural as well as our treaty rights on the northeast waters, from the very nature of things British subjects must be excluded from rights which they do not hold by nature, but only by treaty, in our northern railroad.

I do not say this for the purpose of intimating that there should be reprisals or retaliation in consequence of the outrages in Canada in Canadian waters, which operate to exclude our fishermen from those waters. I have no such words as reprisals and retaliation to use. I have simply to say that one of these recognitions of territoriality is in consideration for the condition of the other. It is a system of equipoise. When one falls the other necessarily falls too. If we prohibit Canadian engines, Canadian cars, Canadian freight, and Canadian passengers from the right of passing through our territory, it is because this passage or transit is a necessary incident of the fishing rights possessed by our fishermen in the northeast waters by treaty and by the law of nations. The passage by the Canadian Parliament of a statute making it impracticable for our fishermen to pursue their trade in the northeastern waters involves as a necessary consequence the passage of a statute by the Congress of the United States precluding Canadians from passing through the territory of the United States or carrying or sending through it their locomotives, their cars, their goods, or their vessels.

It may be said that the cases are not parallel and that the conduct of the Canadian authorities to our fishermen does not amount to an exclusion of our fishermen from the fisheries to such an extent as to assimilate it to an exclusion of Canadians and of Canadian engines, cars, goods, and vessels from transit over the territory of the United States. But I maintain that the conduct of the Canadian authorities in this relation does amount to such an exclusion. And I can not sustain this position better than by quoting the following passages from a letter from Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State to Mr. Phelps, dated November, 1886, and contained in the fishery papers submitted by the President to the present Congress. The passages referred to are as follows:

MR. BAYARD TO MR. PHELPS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 6, 1886.

SIR: On October 7, 1886, the United States fishing vessel, the Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., Alexander Landry, a citizen of the United States, being her captain, arrived shortly before midnight, under stress of weather, at the outer harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia. The night was stormy, with a strong head-wind against her, and her sole object was temporary shelter. She remained at the spot where she anchored, which was about seven miles from the port of Shelburne, no one leaving her until 6 o'clock the next morning, when she hoisted sail in order to put to sea. She had scarcely started, however, before she was arrested and boarded by a boat's crew from the Canadian cruiser Terror. Captain Landry was compelled to proceed to Shelburne, about seven miles distant, to report to the collector.

When the report was made Captain Landry was informed that he was fined $400 for not reporting on the previous night. He answered that the custom-house was not open during the time that he was in the outer harbor. He further insisted that it was obvious from the storm that caused him to take shelter in that harbor, from the shortness of his stay, and from the circumstances that his equipments were exclusively for deep-sea fishing, and that he had made no effort whatever to approach the shore, that his object was exclusively to find shelter. The fine, however, being imposed principally through the urgency of Captain Quigley, commanding the Terror, Captain Landry was informed that he was to be detained at the port of Shelburne until a deposit to meet the fine was made. He consulted Mr. White, the United States consular agent at Shelburne, who at once telegraphed the facts to Mr. Phelan, United States consul-general at Halifax, it being of great importance to Captain Landry and to those interested in his venture that he should proceed on his voyage at once.

Mr. Phelan then telegraphed to the assistant commissioner of customs at Ottawa that it was impossible for Captain Landry to have reported while he was in the outer harbor on the 8th instant, and asking that the deposit required to release the vessel be reduced. He was told in reply that the minister declined to reduce the deposit, but that it might be made at Halifax. Mr. Phelan at once deposited at Halifax the $400, and telegraphed to Captain Landry that he was at liberty to go to sea. On the evening of October 11 Mr. Phelan received a telegram from Captain Landry, who had already been kept four days in the port, stating that "the custom-house officers and Captain Quigley" refused to let him go to sea.

Mr. Phelan, the next morning, called on the collector at Halifax to ascertain if an order had issued to release the vessel, and was informed that the order had been given, "but that the collector and captain of the cruiser refused to obey it, for the reason that the captain of the seized vessel hoisted the American flag while she was in custody of Canadian officials." Mr. Phelan at once telegraphed this state of facts to the assistant commissioner at Ottawa, and received in reply, under date of August 12, the announcement that "collector has been instructed to release the Grimes from customs seizure. This department has nothing to do with other charges." On the same day a dispatch from the commissioner of customs at Ottawa was sent to the collector of customs at Halifax reciting the order to release the Grimes, and saying "this [the customs] department has nothing to do with other charges. It is department of marine."

The facts as to the flag were as follows:

On October 11, the Marion Grimes, being then under arrest by order of local officials for not immediately reporting at the custom-house, hoisted the American flag. Captain Quigley, who, representing, as appeared, not the revenue, but the marine department of the Canadian administration, was, with his "cruiser," keeping guard over the vessel, ordered the flag to be hauled down. This order was obeyed; but about an hour afterwards the flag was again hoisted, whereupon Captain Quigley boarded the vessel with an armed crew and lowered the flag himself. The vessel was finally released under orders of the customs department, being compelled to pay $8 costs in addition to the deposit of $400 above specified.

The seriousness of the damage inflicted on Captain Landry and those interested in his venture will be understood when it is considered that he had a crew of twelve men, with full supplies of bait, which his detention spoiled.

You will at once see that the grievances I have narrated fall under two distinct heads.

The first concerns the boarding by Captain Quigley of the Marion Grimes on the morning of October 8th, and compelling her to go to the town of Shelburne, there subjecting her to a fine of $400 for visiting the port without reporting, and detaining her there arbitrarily four days, a portion of which time was after a deposit to meet the fine had been made.

This particular wrong I now proceed to consider with none the less gravity, because other outrages of the same class have been perpetrated by Captain Quigley. On August 18th last I had occasion, as you will see by the annexed papers, to bring to the notice of the British minister at this capital several instances of aggression on the part of Captain Quigley on our fishing vessels. On October 19, 1886, I had also to bring to the British minister's notice the fact that Captain Quigley had, on September the 10th, arbitrarily arrested the Everett Steele, a United States fishing vessel, at the outer port of Shelburne. To these notes I have received no reply. Copies are transmitted, with the accompanying papers, to you, in connection with the present instruction, so that the cases, as part of a class, can be presented by you to Her Majesty's Government.

Were there no treaty relations whatever between the United States and Great Britain, were the United States fishermen without any other right to visit those coasts than are possessed by the fishing craft of any foreign country simply as such, the arrest and boarding of the Grimes, as above detailed, followed by forcing her into the port of Shelburne, there subjecting her to fine for not reporting, and detaining her until her bait and ice were spoiled, are wrongs which I am sure Her Majesty's Government will be prompt to redress. No Governments have been more earnest and resolute in insisting that vessels driven by stress of weather into foreign harbors should not be subject to port exactions than the Governments of Great Britain and the United States. So far has this solicitude been carried that both Governments, from motives of humanity, as well as of interest as leading maritime powers, have adopted many measures by which foreigners as well as citizens or subjects arriving within their territorial waters may be protected from the perils of the sea.

For this purpose not merely light-houses and light-ships are placed by us at points of danger, but an elaborate life-saving service, well equipped with men, boats, and appliances for relief, studs our seaboard in order to render aid to vessels in distress, without regard to their nationality. Other benevolent organizations are sanctioned by Government which bestow rewards on those who hazard their lives in the protection of life and property in vessels seeking in our waters refuge from storms. Acting in this spirit the Government of the United States has been zealous, not merely in opening its ports freely, without charges to vessels seeking them in storm, but in insisting that its own vessels seeking foreign ports under such circumstances, and exclusively for such shelter, are not under the law of nations subject to custom-house exactions. * * *

In such coasts, at early dawn, after a stormy night, it is not unusual for boats, on errands of relief, to visit vessels which have been struggling with storm during the night. But in no such errand of mercy was Captain Quigley engaged. The Marion Grimes, having found shelter during the night's storm, was about to depart on her voyage, losing no time while her bait was fresh and her ice lasted, when she was boarded by an armed crew, forced to go 7 miles out of her way to the port, and was there under pressure of Captain Quigley, against the opinion originally expressed of the collector, subjected to a fine of $400 with costs, and detained there, as I shall notice hereafter, until her voyage was substantially broken up. I am confident Her Majesty's Government will concur with me in the opinion that, as a question of international law, aside from treaty and other rights, the arrest and detention under the circumstances of Captain Landry and of his vessel were in violation of the law of nations as well as the law of humanity, and that on this ground alone the fine and the costs should be refunded and the parties suffering be indemnified for their losses thereby incurred.

It is not irrelevant, on such an issue as the present, to inquire into the official position of Captain Quigley, "of the Canadian cruiser Terror." He was, as the term "Canadian cruiser" used by him enables us to conclude, not an officer in Her Majesty's distinctive service. He was not the commander of a revenue cutter, for the head of the customs service disavowed him. Yet he was arresting and boarding, in defiance of law, a vessel there seeking shelter, over-influencing the collector of the port into the imposition of a fine, hauling down with his own hand the flag of the United States, which was displayed over the vessel, and enforcing arbitrarily an additional period of detention after the deposit had been made, simply because the captain of the vessel refused to obey him by executing an order insulting to the flag which the vessel bore. If armed cruisers are employed in seizing, harassing, and humiliating storm-bound vessels of the United States on Canadian coasts, breaking up their voyages and mulcting them with fines and costs, it is important for reasons presently to be specified that this Government should be advised of the fact.

From Her Majesty's Government redress is asked. And that redress, as I shall have occasion to say hereafter, is not merely the indemnification of the parties suffering by Captain Quigley's actions, but his withdrawal from the waters where the outrages I represent to you have been committed.

I have already said that the claims thus presented could be abundantly sustained by the law of nations, aside from treaty and other rights. But I am not willing to rest the case on the law of nations. It is essential that the issue between United States fishing vessels and the "cruiser Terror" should be examined in all its bearings, and settled in regard not merely to the general law of nations, but to the particular rights of the parties aggrieved.

It is a fact that the fishing vessel Marion Grimes had as much right under the special relations of Great Britain and the United States to enter the harbor of Shelburne as had the Canadian cruiser. The fact that the Grimes was liable to penalties for the abuse of such right of entrance does not disprove its existence. Captain Quigley is certainly liable to penalties for his misconduct on the occasion referred to. Captain Landry was not guilty of misconduct in entering and seeking to leave that harbor, and had abused no privilege. But whether liable or not, for subsequent abuse of the rights, I maintain that the right of free entrance into that port to obtain shelter, and whatever is incident thereto, belonged as much to the American fishing-vessel as to the Canadian cruiser. * * *

I might here content myself with noticing that the treaty of 1818, herein reciting a principle of the law of nations as well as ratifying a right previously possessed by fishermen of the United States, expressly recognizes the right of these fishermen to enter the "bays or harbors" of Her Majesty's Canadian dominions "for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein." The extent of other recognitions of rights in the same clause need not here be discussed. At present it is sufficient to say that the placing an armed cruiser at the mouth of a harbor in which the United States fishing vessels are accustomed and are entitled to seek shelter on their voyages, such cruiser being authorized to arrest and board our fishing vessels seeking such shelter, is an infraction not merely of the law of nations, but of a solemn treaty stipulation. That, so far as concerns the fishermen so affected, its consequences are far reaching and destructive, it is not necessary here to argue.

Fishing vessels only carry provisions enough for each particular voyage. If they are detained several days on their way to the fishing banks the venture is broken up. The arrest and detention of one or two operates upon all. They can not as a class, with their limited capital and resources, afford to run risks so ruinous. Hence, rather than subject themselves to even the chances of suffering the wrongs inflicted by Captain Quigley, "of the Canadian cruiser Terror," on some of their associates, they might prefer to abandon their just claim to the shelter consecrated to them alike by humanity, ancient title, the law of nations, and by treaty, and face the gravest peril and the wildest seas in order to reach their fishing grounds. You will therefore represent to Her Majesty's Government that the placing Captain Quigley in the harbor of Shelburne to inflict wrongs and humiliation on United States fishermen there seeking shelter is, in connection with other methods of annoyance and injury, expelling United States fishermen from waters, access to which, of great importance in the pursuit of their trade, is pledged to them by great Britain, not merely as an ancient right, but as part of a system of international settlement. * * *

There can be no question on this state of facts as to the rightfulness of the conclusions expressed by Mr. Bayard in the same letter, as follows:

What I am anxious you should now impress upon the British Government is the fact that, as the fishery clause in this treaty, a clause continued in the treaty of 1818, was a part of a system of reciprocal recognitions which are interdependent, the abrogation of this clause, not by consent, but by acts of violence and of insult, such as those of the Canadian cruiser Terror, would be fraught with consequences which I am sure could not be contemplated by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain without immediate action being taken to avert them. To the extent of the system thus assailed I now direct attention.

When Lord Shelburne and Dr. Franklin negotiated the treaty of peace, the area on which its recognitions were to operate was limited. They covered, on the one hand, the fisheries; but the map of Canada in those days, as studied by Lord Shelburne, gives but a very imperfect idea of the territory near which the fisheries lay. Halifax was the only port of entry on the coast; the New England States were there and the other nine were provinces, but no organized governments to the west of them. It was on this area only, as well as on Great Britain, that the recognitions and guarantees of the treaty were at first to operate. Yet comparatively small as this field may now seem, it was to the preservation over it of certain reciprocal rights that the attention of the negotiators was mainly given. And the chief of these rights were: (1) the fisheries, a common enjoyment in which by both parties took nothing from the property of either; and (2) the preservation to the citizens or subjects of each country of title to property in the other.

Since Lord Shelburne's premiership this system of reciprocity and mutual convenience has progressed under the treaties of 1842 and 1846, so as to give to Her Majesty's subjects, as well as to citizens of the United States, the free use of the river Detroit on both sides of the island Bois Blanc, and between that island and the American and Canadian shores, and all the several channels and passages between the various islands lying near the junction of the river Saint Clair with the lake of that name. By the treaty of 1846 the principle of common border privileges was extended to the Pacific Ocean. The still existing commercial articles of the treaty of 1871 further amplified those mutual benefits by embracing the use of the inland water-ways of either country, and defining enlarged privileges of bonded transit by land and water through the United States for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Dominion. And not only by treaties has the development of Her Majesty's American dominion, especially to the westward, been aided by the United States, but the vigorous contemporaneous growth under the enterprise and energy of citizens of the Northwestern States and Territories of the United States has been productive of almost equal advantages to the adjacent possessions of the British Crown, and the favoring legislation by Congress has created benefits in the way of railway facilities which under the sanction of State laws have been and are freely and beneficially enjoyed by the inhabitants of the Dominion and their Government.

Under this system of energetic and co-operative development the coast of the Pacific has been reached by the transcontinental lines of railway within the territorial limits of the respective countries, and, as I have stated, the United States being the pioneers in this remarkable progress, have been happily able to anticipate and incidentally to promote the subsequent success of their neighbors in British America.

It will be scarcely necessary for you to say to Lord Iddesleigh that the United States, in thus aiding in the promotion of the prosperity, and in establishing the security of Her Majesty's Canadian dominions, claims no particular credit. It was prompted, in thus opening its territory to Canadian use, and incidentally for Canadian growth, in large measure by the consciousness that such good offices are part of a system of mutual convenience and advantage growing up under the treaties of peace and assisted by the natural forces of friendly contiguity. Therefore it is that we witness with surprise and painful apprehension the United States fishermen hampered in their enjoyment of their undoubted rights in the fisheries.

The hospitalities of Canadian coasts and harbors, which are ours by ancient right, and which these treaties confirm, cost Canada nothing and are productive of advantage to her people. Yet, in defiance of the most solemn obligations, in utter disregard of the facilities and assistances granted by the United States, and in a way especially irritating, a deliberate plan of annoyances and aggressions has been instituted and plainly exhibited during the last fishing season—a plan calculated to drive these fishermen from shores where, without injury to others, they prosecute their own legitimate and useful industry.

It is impossible not to see that if the unfriendly and unjust system, of which the cases now presented are part, is sustained by Her Majesty's Government, serious results will almost necessarily ensue, great as is the desire of this Government to maintain the relations of good neighborhood. Unless Her Majesty's Government shall effectually check these aggressions a general conviction on the part of the people of the United States may naturally be apprehended that, as treaty stipulations in behalf of our fishermen, based on their ancient rights, cease to be respected, the maintenance of the comprehensive system of mutual commercial accommodation between Canada and the United States could not reasonably be expected.

It is some satisfaction, however slight, that since the reception of this letter, the conduct of Captain Quigley, in tearing down the United States flag from the Marion Grimes, has been apologized for, though in a somewhat meager way, by the Canadian authorities. But no apology, so far as I know, has been made for Captain Quigley's course in dragging the Marion Grimes from the shelter she was entitled to in the outer waters of Shelburne harbor, forcing her into the port of Shelburne, and virtually breaking up her voyage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was not even an apology from Her Majesty's Government itself. She only, I believe, communicated the apology which her own Province had suggested to her.

Mr. GORMAN. I will say in answer to the Senator from Vermont, that it was not at all satisfactory. For the outrage in driving him out of the harbor where he was for shelter, and breaking up the voyage, there has been no sufficient explanation made by anybody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But does the Senator think there was sufficient apology in respect of hauling down the American flag that this master on his own ship, although he happened to be in duress, had for his own comfort run up?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not, and the whole purport of what I desired to say to the Senate (which I hoped to be better prepared to do than I am now), was that I do not believe the Senator from Vermont and his committee go far enough in the bill which is now pending before the Senate. My objection to his proposition is that he fails to strike at the only point in which they are vulnerable, that is the exclusion of the cars and engines in which their great trade passes through this country and without which they would be powerless.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While I do not want to prolong the debate, and have not entered into it really, because I thought that everybody would see the force of this bill, I will state that the President of the United States may exclude all things of every kind coming from the Canadian provinces under one clause of the bill, which would include engines and cars as well as everything else. But suppose it did not include engines and cars but included all their cargoes, I ask whether it would be any great comfort to the British dominions to run empty cars, to have no passengers and freight, with their engines from Quebec to Portland? I think if the Senator will study the bill a little more (and probably he would but for the stress of business which obliges us to go on to night) he will see that if the President of the United States, as we must suppose he will, will justly and fairly and without heat or passion but firmly and bravely do what this measure authorizes him to do, all the redress, the equalization that can be got by peaceful means is within his power.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether the bill, in his opinion, would authorize the President to exclude all the goods and merchandise that passes over the Canadian roads into our country?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, if they are Dominion products, for it says so. It does not authorize the President to terminate the treaty between the United States and Great Britain which provides for the crossing of American goods over their territory or the crossing of their goods for export over ours, because that is a matter of treaty arrangement that we have engaged to do. Therefore, inasmuch as the relation otherwise than that mere matter of transit for exportation was not a matter of treaty, but was a matter of municipal regulation in either country, the committee thought we could, without making ourselves obnoxious to any just criticism on the part of Great Britain or of its government, do the thing which we have proposed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I desire to ask the Senator whether in dealing with Canada we are not dealing with Great Britain?

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is the question I ask now, and I wish to have the Senator answer.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Virginia will pardon me for a moment. While I am interrupted by the Senator from Vermont I should like to ask him whether he considers the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington still in force which authorizes them to cross our territory with goods free from Canada for export from the United States?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not remember the number of the article, but the twenty-ninth article, I believe, was not terminated by the resolutions of Congress and by the President by proclamation on the 1st of July, 1885—the thirtieth was—and I think it does still exist, as I understand it, a treaty arrangement between Great Britain and the United States, by which American goods may pass through Canada to some other American port or place, crossing it by rail, and British goods may pass through the United States from Canada to a seaport, and so vice versa.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I deny it, and ask you to give the proof of it. Show us the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point of the committee was to keep entirely within what had been the course internationally between Great Britain and the United States in regard to the British dominions and its intercourse with the United States as such, and not to open any question of our retaliating, as the phrase has been, which is a rough phrase, in respect of those particular matters that we had engaged by treaty might be done. We thought that there was ample scope and verge enough outside of that to produce in the British authorities a state of consideration that would lead them to treat our fishing and trading vessels in their ports fairly, for that is the only point wherein we have been ill-treated.

Mr. GORMAN. I knew that there was some question as to whether we were still under treaty obligations to permit their cars to pass through and over our territory with the products from this country as well as from their own, but I supposed the weight of authority was that that article of the treaty is no longer in existence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the twenty-ninth article was not abrogated by the joint resolution of Congress, if I have the number right. The thirtieth was; the twenty-ninth, I think, was not.

Mr. GORMAN. I supposed it was so held, and that we had the unquestionable right to exclude the cars and engines from passing through this country. If we have, or if we have the right to exclude their goods, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, then unquestionably this fishery question will be settled in a very short time, for, as my friend from Missouri has said, whenever it comes to a question of dollars and cents or commerce with Great Britain we can always get a treaty if the advantage is upon that side.

But I resume what I was saying in regard to Captain Quigley. Captain Quigley, so far from being recalled, as he should have been, is retained to pursue his work of insult and obstruction; that work of insult and obstruction, so far from being apologized for and countermanded, is, by the very act of limiting the apology to the tearing down the flag, openly sanctioned. Nor is this all. It is plain from other outrages on the coast that the action in the Grimes case is part of a system of annoyance and injury which aims at the driving our American fishermen from waters to which they have as much right as the cruisers by which they are assailed. And, as if to settle the question, and to impress upon us the fact that the Canadian system of aggression is to be made permanent and is to be followed up by the severest statutory penalties, we have now presented to us a statute adopted by the Canadian Parliament, and transmitted on June 2, 1886, to England for royal assent, which assent was given by the Queen in council on November 26, 1886. The third and material section of this statute is as follows:

3. Any one of the officers or persons hereinbefore mentioned (various Canadian officials, &c.) may bring any ship, vessel, or boat, being within any harbor in Canada, or hovering in British waters within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors in Canada, into port, and search her cargo, and may also examine the master upon oath touching the cargo and voyage; and if the master or person in command does not truly answer the questions put to him in such examination, he shall incur a penalty of $400; and if such ship, vessel, or boat is foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, and (a) has been found fishing or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing in British waters within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of Canada, not included within the above mentioned limits, without a license, or after the expiration of the term named in the last license granted to such ship, vessel, or boat under the first section of this act, or (b) has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada for the time being in force, such ship, vessel, or boat and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof, shall be forfeited.

We have here authority given to Canadian officials to arrest our fishing vessels when "hovering in British waters within 3 marine miles" of the very coasts which those vessels are entitled, by ancient right, recognized by treaty, not merely to pass through, but to visit for shelter, wood, water, repairs, and other purposes incidental there to; and the penalty, when the vessels are so arrested, is not merely a contingent personal fine, but forfeiture of vessel, stores, and cargo, imposed in case the Canadian officials should hold that its visit is for any purpose not permitted by treaty or by Canada laws. What the Canadian authorities hold to be the meaning of the treaty of 1818, and the laws of Canada relative thereto, we have already seen. It is like the pound of flesh without the drop of blood. Our sailors can go to the shore for shelter, for wood, but if they do anything when there, however innocent, except obtaining shelter, repairs, water, or wood—if they buy a plug of tobacco, or a sailor's needle, or a sheet of paper, or a bucket of bait exclusively for deep-sea fishing, or a bag of provisions for themselves—then down comes the fine, and the decree of forfeiture. It is just as gross a violation of the treaty as it would be for us, when giving transit to Canadian rolling stock over our roads, to say, "Yes, drive along you may, but the moment one of your engineers buys a sandwich from a huckster or a paper from a newsboy, confiscated your goods shall be."

The measure I advocate—that of prohibiting Canadians from making use of United States territory for the transport of their locomotives, cars, freight, and vessels from point to point on the Canadian frontier—is eminently one of peace, being the most effectual means of restoring the reciprocities recognized by the treaty of 1783, and ratified, so far as concerns the fisheries, by the treaty of 1818. The measure is not harsh. Great Britain, in sanctioning Canadian aggressions on our fishermen, shuts us out from a transit to which we have as much right as Canadians themselves. We, by the measure I urge, merely shut Canadians out from a transit they enjoy from sufferance. Great Britain, in knocking down one of the chief props of the system of our reciprocities, knocks down the system itself. All we do is to say, "The system is down, but the hand of destruction was not ours." The right of way which I propose to withdraw is one that can be withdrawn without any violation of good faith or any shock to that sense of right which I hold to be the basis of international law.

But the driving of our fishermen from their rights in Canadian waters I hold to be a gross violation of good faith, and a rude assault on that sense of right on which, as I say, international law rests. The fishermen of the United States have as much right on those coasts, under law and treaty, and subject to certain very limited renunciations, as have the inhabitants of those coasts. The system of insult and annoyance and obstruction adopted by the Canadian authorities, coupled with the assertion of that right in the statute I have just quoted, will operate as effectually to drive our fishermen from these coasts as would an absolute barrier of chains. Fishermen, from the nature of things, can not afford to enter harbors where they run the chance of being arrested, fined, and detained until their provisions are exhausted and their voyage broken up. Heretofore they were assured of supplies and shelter when they visited the provincial waters on their way to the fishing grounds.

Now, it would be far better for them to face tempestuous seas than to seek shelter and supplies in harbors in which, perfect as is their right, they are exposed to insults and to arrests fatal to their ventures. The mere risk of such treatment drives them off; and driven off they are from waters won by the valor of their forefathers and to which they themselves hold a title as perfect as that possessed by the Canadians.

The transit of our fishermen through Canadian waters, with the incident of the right of supply, belonging to them by treaty and by the law of nations is thus cut off. With it necessarily falls the transit of Canadian locomotives, cars, and vessels through the territory of the United States. The system falls through British aggression, marked, I regret to say, not unfrequently by insolence. In what way Canada is benefited by pursuing this course, it is hard to say.

The deep-sea fisheries are open to all nationalities, independently of the special rights held by the United States; and these fisheries are so exhaustless that the supply Canada draws from them is not in the least degree diminished by the use of them by fishermen from other countries. Even were it otherwise, the obstructions put in the way of our fishermen in their transit will not ultimately impede them in their voyages to the fishing grounds. The insults are irritating; the wrongs cruel and in gross violation of international duty; but those who know the energy of American fishermen, and the spirit of the American people, and the fertility of resources which necessity in such a people calls forth, will readily see that the conveniences of this transit can be dispensed with.

Larger boats, capable of carrying greater masses of provisions, can be built. Bait can be preserved and carried for a ten weeks' voyage as well as for a voyage of ten days. The risks of shipwreck can be encountered as readily as the risks of annoyance and confiscation in Canadian ports. But in the mean time a heavy bill is growing up against Great Britain for the losses incurred by these spoliations; and with the transit of our fishermen on Canadian waters falls the transit of Canadian vessels, engines, and freight, through the territory of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPOONER (when Mr. KENNA'S name was called). I was requested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] to announce his pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] on all questions connected with this measure.

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is unavoidably absent. If he were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] asked me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I am not apprised as to how he would vote on these matters. I am only apprised as to what I should do if I were not paired, which is to cast every vote I can against Great Britain.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—6.

Call,	Gorman,	Vance,	Vest.
Cockrell,	Gray,

NAYS—40.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Allison,	Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Berry,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Blair,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Teller,
Brown,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Walthall,
Cheney,	Frye,	Palmer,	Whitthorne,
Coke,	Hale,	Platt,	Williams,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—29.

Bowen,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Butler,	Harris,	Maxey,	Stanford,
Camden,	Harrison,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Cameron,	Ingalls,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Voorhees,
Chace,	Jones of Arkansas,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
George,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Gibson,	McPherson,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 44, after the words "United States," insert:

And also, if he think proper to prohibit the entrance into the United States from Canada of any engines, rolling-stock, or cars, with any goods that may be therein contained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has moved another amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 51, after the word "vessels," insert the words:

Engines, rolling-stock, cars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will now be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a commissioner, to proceed to such places in the United States or elsewhere as may be designated by the Secretary of State, to take testimony under oath or affirmation in relation to the losses and injuries inflicted since the 31st of December, 1885, by British authorities, imperial or colonial, upon citizens of the United States engaged in the fisheries on the northeastern coasts of British North America. Said commissioner shall everywhere have, in respect to the administration of oaths or affirmations and the taking of testimony, the same powers as a commissioner of the circuit court, and shall be paid the same fees as are prescribed for similar services of the commissioner of a circuit court, together with traveling expenses.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I second the demand.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say just one word. There is no custom in the history of the United States for this sort of thing and it has no place on this bill. The custom always has been for people who felt themselves injured to file in the Department of State their protests, supported by such evidence as they choose to submit, which is put on file, and which makes the basis of negotiation, if any negotiation is necessary, for redress. Therefore, this is merely to have the effect, so far as any usefulness with Great Britain or anybody else goes, to provide a number of employments for a number of gentlemen who would hunt around for testimony.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to say that protests will be filed in the case of all these vessels?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say, if not it will be the fault of the vessel-owners; but in nearly every case where anybody had complained, probably in every one, they have been filed.

Mr. VEST. I take it for granted that numbers of these fishermen know nothing about this legal process or international law. The amendment can possibly do no harm. It simply is to perpetuate testimony, and it merely provides for the appointment of one officer, and all the fees he receives are those of a circuit-court commissioner. He is to be sent where the State Department orders him. I have not a constituent interested in this matter, but I think it is proper for people who have been injured.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not a constituent who is interested, and I think it is improper for the people who have been injured. If this commissioner hunting around found them to be absent and did not report it, Great Britain would say: "Why did not your commissioner report this thing?" I think if you will leave the people of the United States as they always have been left to make their complaints to the Department of State, it is the safest thing for them and for us.

Mr. VEST. If no protest is found as a matter of course that is conclusive that there is no such claim. I want to protect those people. The Senator from Vermont, on the other hand, by this legislation would leave those people without any proof at all if they did not happen to file protests.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). As I have already announced, the pair which I had with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has been transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] asked me to announce his pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. If he were here I should vote "yea," but as I do not know how the Senator from Tennessee would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Morgan,	Walthall.
Berry,	Coke,	Pugh,	Whitthorne.
Blackburn,	Colquitt,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Eustis,	Vance,
Call,	Gray,	Vest,

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Cheney,	Hale,	Morrill,	Teller,
Conger,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Williams,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,

ABSENT—31.

Bowen,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Butler,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Camden,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Harris,	Maxey,	Stanford,
Chace,	Harrison,	Miller,	Van Wyck,
Evarts,	Ingalls,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Voorhees,
Fair,	Jones of Arkansas,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
George,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any speech, but I simply wish to say that while I shall vote for the bill, I desire to see the policy pursued of carrying on non-intercourse with Great Britain or Canada. I think the best policy to be introduced would be to sustain the President and Secretary of State in declarations in favor of the right of American shippers and the men engaged in the fisheries to have the benefit of the ports according to the custom of nations, and by joint resolution of the two Houses to indicate to Great Britain that this Government will insist upon that right to any and every extremity. I shall vote for the bill because it has taken that direction, but in my judgment its provisions are not wise.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be regarded as concurred in.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. Put the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia object.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; I object. This is the last opportunity I shall have. "If there be no objection" is what the Chair said, and I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is unavoidably absent. If he were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is also unavoidably absent. He would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] asked me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN (when the name of Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, was called). I have been requested by my colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Maryland], to announce the pair between himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 46, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—46.

Aldrich.	Conger,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Berry,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Blair,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Vance,
Brown,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Vest,
Call,	Frye,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Cheney,	Gorman,	Platt,	Whitthorne,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Plumb,	Williams,
Coke,	Hale,	Pugh,	Wilson of Iowa.
Colquitt,	Hawley,

NAYS—1.

Riddleberger.

ABSENT—28.

Bowen,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Ransom,

George,	Jones of Florida,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.

So the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves——

Mr. BECK. I addressed the Chair a good many times in a pretty loud tone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I addressed the Chair first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair heard the Senator from Vermont distinctly submit a motion to adjourn. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, with pleasure, if the Senator has anything to say.

Mr. BECK. If the Chair heard the Senator from Vermont first, I have not a word to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I addressed the Chair first; but I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont addressed the Chair before the Senator from Kentucky, and the Chair was submitting the motion made by him to the Senate. The motion is withdrawn, and the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I desire to give notice (and that is all I rose to say) that to-morrow morning, immediately after the morning business, I shall seek the floor to call up the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States, and I shall endeavor to press the measure until it is finally disposed of.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to remind the Senate that I have twice given notice that I shall try to get up to-morrow the unfinished business of the first week of the session, being the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to woman suffrage.

Mr. BECK. We shall then see which measure the Senate will decide to take up.

Mr. CALL. I wish to ask both the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New Hampshire to give place to me to-morrow, while I have a vote in the morning upon the resolution which I have discussed before the Senate. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow to allow a vote to be taken upon the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes, p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 25, at 12 o'clock, m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, January 19, 1887.

UNITED STATES CONSUL.

Willoughby Walling, of Indianapolis, Ind., to be consul of the United States at Leith.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

John F. Lynch, to be collector of customs at Machias, in the State of Maine.

Charles W. Roberts, to be collector of customs at Bangor, in the State of Maine.

POSTMASTERS.

William T. Johnson, to be postmaster at Cambridge, in the county of Dorchester and State of Maryland.

John T. Ryan, to be postmaster at South Bethlehem, in the county of Northampton and State of Pennsylvania.

Sallie Shelton, to be postmaster at Windsor, in the county of Henry and State of Missouri.

Edward Bowman, to be postmaster at Brunswick, in the county of Chariton and State of Missouri.

John Poston, to be postmaster at Kiowa, in the county of Barber and State of Kansas.

John F. Blackburn, to be postmaster at Hutchinson, in the county of Reno and State of Kansas.

Anthony Brandt, to be postmaster at Bellevue, in the county of Jackson and State of Iowa.

Frank Campbell, to be postmaster at O'Neill, in the county of Holt and State of Nebraska.

James Frey, to be postmaster at Sigourney, in the county of Keokuk and State of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the nomination of James Frey to be postmaster at Sigourney, in the county of Keokuk and State of Iowa, in place of John Morrison, suspended, submits the following report:

No charges appear in this case tending to affect the character for integrity of Mr. Morrison, or in any degree reflecting on his good name. He has been a competent and efficient officer. He has been suspended because he is a member of the Republican party, and his place was wanted for a member of the Democratic party. This being the case, he does not care to contest the confirmation of a successor; and, inasmuch as his good name is not assailed, the committee report back the nomination of his successor with a recommendation that it be confirmed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 24, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

UNION PACIFIC INDEBTEDNESS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information concerning the amount of indebtedness of the subsidized Pacific railroad companies of the United States, and the effect upon said indebtedness of the passage of House bill 8318; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 22, 1887.

SIR: I am in receipt of House resolution of January 20, 1887, requesting that the House of Representatives be informed as soon as practicable what sums of money were owing from the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies to the United States on the 1st day of January, 1887; the sums which are due, principal and interest, under existing law severally and collectively from said companies, and what will be the result to the Treasury and the effect upon these debts if House bill 8318 should become a law and its provisions be complied with.

In reply thereto, I have the honor to state that the amount due from the several Pacific railroad companies for interest paid by the United States to January 1, 1887, on subsidy bonds issued to said companies was $70,854,325.62, of which there had been repaid by the companies at that date the sum of $21,552,144.14, leaving due on account of interest the sum of $49,302,181.48.

There will be due on the same account at maturity of the subsidy bonds September 11, 1897, the further sum of $43,406,921.88, making a total of $92,709,103.36 due and to become due on account of interest. There is also to become due on account of principal of these bonds at maturity the sum of $64,623,512, making an aggregate indebtedness due and to become due of $157,332,615.36.

In response to the inquiry, "What will be the result to the Treasury and the effect upon these debts if House bill 8318 should become a law and its provisions be complied with?" I will state that the present worth of the indebtedness of the several companies as of October 1, 1886, ascertained as prescribed in the bill, is $108,463,331.54.

The constant semi-annual payment required to cancel the present worth of the indebtedness above mentioned, principal and interest, in seventy years, computed at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, reinvested semi-annually, is $1,858,057.91.

The constant semi-annual payment arrived at by the method prescribed in the bill, to wit, $1,854,304.52, is less than the correctly computed semi-annual payment above mentioned by $3,753.39, or about one-fifth of 1 per cent., and this constant semi-annual payment is sufficient, if reinvested semi-annually, to pay at the rate of 2.992 per cent. per annum on the said present worth, and at that rate to extinguish the principal and interest of the debt in seventy years.

In view of certain provisions of the act of May 7, 1878, commonly known as the Thurman law, establishing a sinking fund for the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, it may be proper to consider whether the sinking fund now held in trust by the United States should be treated as an off-set in determining the net indebtedness due the Government from these companies.

It should be mentioned, however, that a condition of the bill is that its provisions shall be accepted by the companies interested.

An analysis of the subject has been prepared by Mr. E. B. Elliott, Government actuary, a copy of which, with its inclosures, together with a detailed statement of the indebtedness due from each company, is herewith transmitted.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the actuary and the other papers accompanying this communication be also printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1887.

SIR: In the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 20, 1887, submitted by Hon. Mr. OUTHWAITE, relative to—

"The sums of money owing from the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies to the United States," it is asked, "What will be the result to the Treasury and the effect upon these debts if House bill 8318 should become a law and its provisions be complied with?"

In response it may be stated that the total sum that would be due to the United States for principal and interest paid and to be paid at maturity on the subsidy bonds issued to the said companies, if no payments or reimbursements had been made thereon by the said companies, is $178,884,759.50, of which $64,623,512 is principal, and $114,261,247.50 is interest computed without compounding at 6 per cent. per annum.

The average date of the bonds issued is September 11, 1867, but the average date of the issue of these bonds to the several companies is later than this date by $\frac{333}{1000}$ of a year, or about 6 months and 11$\frac{3}{4}$ days, and the average date of their maturity is September 11, 1897.

The amount of deductions to be made from this total sum, according to the provisions of the bill (page 2, line 25, to page 3, line 36), to wit, reimbursements by transportation and cash on account of interest to October 1, 1886, $21,294,886.74; market value of bonds belonging to the sinking fund held by the Treasury October 1, 1886, on account of the Pacific railroad companies, $7,743,817.03, of which the face value of bonds so held was $6,134,100, and the excess of market value over face value of same October 1, 1886, was $1,609,717.03; cash uninvested belonging to the sinking fund October 1, 1886, $2,430,145.85, together with "simple interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum" upon $10,173,962.88, the total amount thus belonging to the sinking fund, from October 1, 1886, to the average date of maturity, a period of 10$\frac{11}{12}$ years, $3,340,451.15—is $34,809,300.77, leaving a remainder of $144,075,458.73 due to the United States at the maturity of the subsidy bonds.

The present worth, as of October 1, 1886, of this remainder, computed for the interval of 10$\frac{11}{12}$ years, at simple discount, at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, is $108,463,331.54.

A constant semi-annual payment of $1,858,057.91, reinvested semi-annually, will pay interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the said present worth, and extinguish the principal of the debt in seventy years.

The constant semi-annual payment arrived at according to the provisions of the bill (page 3, lines 37 to 47), is $1,854,304.52, which is less than the correctly computed semi-annual payment above mentioned by $3,753.39, or about $\frac{1}{500}$ of 1 per cent. This constant semi-annual payment of $1,854,304.52 is sufficient, if reinvested semi-annually, to pay at the rate of 2.992 per cent. per annum on the said present worth, and at that rate to extinguish the debt in seventy years.

Respectfully, yours,

E. B. ELLIOTT,
Government Actuary.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Union Pacific Railway Company (including Kansas Pacific Railway Company).

The total amount that would be due the United States for principal and interest paid on the bonds issued to said companies at their maturity, if no payments or reimbursements had been made thereon by the companies, is $92,844,290.94.

The amount of all deductions to be made from this sum, according to the provisions of this bill (H. R. 8318), to wit: Reimbursements as per bond and interest account, $14,806,520.21; sinking-fund bonds at market value October 1, 1886,

$6,701,812.72; cash uninvested October 1, 1886, belonging to sinking fund, $153,699.33; with interest on $6,855,512.05, the total amount thus belonging to the sinking fund, at 3 per cent. per annum from October 1, 1886, to maturity (of which the average date is July 10, 1897), $2,216,044.27, is $23,878,076.53, leaving a remainder of $68,966,214.41 due to the United States at the maturity of the subsidy bonds.

The present value of this remainder October 1, 1886, computed for the interval, $10\frac{7}{12}$ years, at simple discount at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, is $52,118,809.30,

A constant semi-annual payment of $892,834.15, reinvested semi-annually, will pay at the rate of 3 per cent. a year on the above-mentioned sum ($52,118,809.30), and also extinguish the principal of the debt in seventy years.

The constant semi-annual payment arrived at by the method prescribed in the bill ($890,403.09) is less than the semi-annual payment above mentioned ($892,834.15) by the semi-annual difference of $2,431.06, or about $\frac{1}{37}$ of 1 per cent.

The corresponding annual difference ($4,862.12) amounts to less than $\frac{1}{100}$ of 1 per cent. of $52,118,809.30, the present worth as above given.

The constant semi-annual payment of $890,403.09 is sufficient to pay, if reinvested semi-annually, at the rate of 2.989 per cent. per annum on the said present worth, and extinguish the debt in seventy years.

Central Pacific Railroad Company (including Western Pacific Railroad Company).

The total amount that would be due the United States for principal and interest paid on the bonds issued to said companies, at their maturity, if no payments or reimbursements had been made thereon by the companies, is $77,104,604.41.

The amount of all deductions to be made from this sum, according to the provisions of this bill (H. R. 8318), to wit: Reimbursements as per bond and interest account, $6,009,595.79; sinking-fund bonds at market value October 1, 1886, $1,042,604.31; cash uninvested October 1, 1886, belonging to sinking fund, $2,276,446.52; with interest on $3,318,450.83, the total amount thus belonging to the sinking fund, at 3 per cent. per annum from October 1, 1886, to maturity (of which the average date is December 9, 1897), $1,113,893.32, is $10,441,939.94, leaving a remainder of $66,662,664.47 due to the United States at the maturity of the subsidy bonds.

The present value of this remainder October 1, 1886, computed for the interval, $11\frac{2}{12}$ years, at simple discount at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, is $49,909,657.43.

A constant semi-annual payment of $854,989.72, reinvested semi-annually, will pay at the rate of 3 per cent. a year on the above-mentioned sum ($49,909,657.43), and also extinguish the principal of the debt in seventy years.

The constant semi-annual payment arrived at by the method prescribed in the bill ($854,093.34) is less than the semi-annual payment above mentioned ($854,989.72) by the semi-annual difference of $896.38, or about $\frac{1}{57}$ of 1 per cent.

The corresponding annual difference ($1,792.76) amounts to less than $\frac{1}{1000}$ of 1 per cent. of $49,909,657.43, the present worth as above given.

The constant semi-annual payment of $854,093.34 is sufficient to pay, if reinvested semi-annually at the rate of 2.996 per cent. per annum on the said present worth, and extinguish the debt in seventy years.

Pacific railroad indebtedness, January 1, 1887.

	Interest paid by United States.	Repaid by companies.	Balance interest due the United States.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, until Wednesday next, on account of professional engagements.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Harriet Tubbman.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 10081) to amend the laws governing the militia of the United States was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It should be referred to the Committee on the Militia, and if there be no objection the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10305) to increase the appropriation for the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y., and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. I would like to have a letter from the Supervising Architect read in this connection.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, January 20, 1887.

SIR: Referring to bill (H. R. 10305) introduced by you, to increase the limit of cost for the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y., to $1,500,000, exclusive of cost of site, I have to advise you that in my judgment the full amount therein specified to be appropriated, namely, $1,278,594.12, should be made available immediately, in order to avoid delay in entering into contracts for the completion of the work under the plans for the enlargement of the building. It is necessary that this work be pushed, in view of the delays which have already occurred, occasioned by the failure of Congress at its last session not only to take action upon the bill increasing the limit, but also to appropriate the balance of funds due under the original limit.

Respectfully, yours,

M. C. BELL,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. FELIX CAMPBELL,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire how much has been already appropriated of the one and one-half millions of dollars asked for in this bill toward the work on this building?

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. We have expended for the ground the sum of $408,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the only money expended is that employed in the purchase of the ground?

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. We have the building up one story, as well as the purchase of the ground.

Mr. WILKINS. One story of the building has been erected, but it only covers about one-half of the ground owned by the Government.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. This provides for the completion of the building.

Mr. WILKINS. In order that it may be utilized by the Government at present it would be of little service.

Mr. HOLMAN. The original limit I believe was $800,000?

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it is proposed to increase it to $1,500,000?

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; less the cost of the land.

Mr. JAMES. No; in addition to the cost of the land.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. Yes; I should have said including the cost of the site. This embraces the total expense.

Mr. WILKINS. Over $400,000 was used by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purchase of the site. The building is now completed up to the second story, and perhaps not exceeding one-half of the ground owned by the Government is covered. It will be necessary to complete the building to the full limit of the ground, and to the full amount asked, to make it suitable to the Government's uses at that point. As it is, the building will have to be covered by a temporary roof. It ought to be completed as soon as possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. The whole sum asked in the first instance for this building was $800,000, which sum was allowed, and no larger sum was asked for. But in view of the action of the House in regard to the public building at Pittsburgh and at Louisville, this would not seem to be an extravagant sum.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yet it seems to me that the general dissatisfaction over the appropriation of these large sums of public money grows out of the vast number of these public buildings which are erected in different parts of the country, in nearly all of which cases the original amount appropriated is exceeded before the building is well under way.

I regret very much that the gentleman from New York finds it necessary to ask so large an increase for the construction of this building.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COWLES. I understand the appropriation at first was $750,000. Now they come in with a modest request for a million and a half of dollars. I object, and call for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials from State and Territorial Legislatures are in order, and also resolutions calling for information from the heads of Departments.

SPANISH AND MEXICAN LAND GRANTS, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JOSEPH introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 245) to authorize the appointment of a special committee to investigate Spanish and Mexican land grants in New Mexico; which was read as follows, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims:

Whereas under the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo, by which the Territory of New Mexico was acquired by the United States in 1847, it became the duty of the Congress of the United States to determine the rights of claimants to land under the Governments of Spain and Mexico; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has, after the lapse of forty years, failed to discharge its obligation under said treaty, and the titles to private land grants in said Territory are consequently still vexed and uncertain, and the development of the Territory is thereby greatly retarded; and

Whereas the said Territory contains within its limits an empire of public domain; and

Whereas it is the interest of the Republic that the Congress of the United States should, by appropriate legislation, encourage the occupation of such lands by honest settlers; and

Whereas there is great misapprehension, both among the people and their representatives, as to the conservation of the population of said Territory and the security of life and property among them; and

Whereas there is much ignorance as to the resources and possibilities of said Territory: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, First. That a committee of five, two from the Senate and three from the House, all of whom shall be members of the Fiftieth Congress, to be designated by the presiding officers of said bodies, respectively, be, and are hereby, appointed to visit the Territory of New Mexico in the interval between the adjournment of this Congress and the assembling of the next, with the view and for the purpose of informing themselves as to the character, capacity, and needs of said Territory; and that the said committee do recommend to the next Congress the enactment of such laws as to them shall seem adapted to the condition and conducive to the rapid settlement of said Territory.

Second. That the said committee be, and are hereby, instructed to enlighten themselves as to all parts and interests of said Territory by careful inspection, in a body, of the different localities, for such period as shall prove necessary for the attainment of the desired knowledge.

Third. That the said committee be, and are hereby, authorized to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and to employ a skilled interpreter, stenographer, and clerk, to accompany them during their investigation, and that all the expenses of the proceedings hereby ordered shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. That the sum of five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in order to pay the expenses of said committee, to be paid on the order of said committee, who shall report to Congress a detailed account of such expenditures, and file vouchers thereof with the Secretary of the Treasury.

CONSIDERATION OF TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. JOSEPH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XXVI be amended by adding the following as clause 3:

"3. That the fourth Monday of each month, after the call of States and Territories, until the adjournment of that day, shall, when claimed by the Committee on Territories, be devoted exclusively to the consideration of such business as may be reported by said committee."

SUBSTITUTES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLEMENTS, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House whether or not employés in the Treasury Department are permitted to employ substitutes to perform their duties at a less rate of compensation than is paid to such employés, and the number of such substitutes in such employment, and the rate of compensation paid them, and the salary of their principals; also the number of such substitutes on duty during the months of September and October, 1886, and by what authority such employment is had.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN VESSELS IN FOREIGN PORTS.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the following resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House copies of such correspondence, up to the present day, between this Government and the British Government as he may decide can now properly be made public, in regard to the deprivation inflicted in Canadian ports on American fishing vessels having the right to touch and trade, of the liberty heretofore enjoyed by such vessels to enter Canadian ports open to foreign vessels and buy and sell, and to transmit merchandise therein, and which is permitted in such ports to American trading vessels and to vessels of all other nationalities.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. DUNN. I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports; and by unanimous consent to order that members having reports from committees may submit them at the Clerk's desk for printing and reference. It will expedite business.

The SPEAKER. For this day only.

Mr. DUNN. That is all.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MONUMENT AT STONY POINT.

Under the foregoing order the following reports were submitted:

Mr. STAHLNECKER, from the Committee on the Library, reported back the joint resolution (S. R. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to erect a monument at Stony Point, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

RICHARD D. LANCASTER.

Mr. LOWRY, from the Committee on the Expenditures in the Treasury Department, reported back in the case of Richard D. Lancaster the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That in case of a satisfactory showing being laid before the Attorney-General of the United States establishing prima facie the existence of fraud on the part of Richard D. Lancaster and others in procuring the settlement of a judgment standing against them in favor of the United States on the bond of one James Busby, a distiller, he be, and he is hereby, requested to have an investigation made into such settlement, which it is believed he has full authority to do, and should there be sufficient grounds therefor developed that such proceedings be immediately instituted as shall be necessary to set aside said settlement and to enforce the collection of said judgment. And the Attorney-General is requested to make report of his action herein to the House at this session of Congress.

UNITED STATES CUSTOM-HOUSE AT KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with amendment, a bill (S. 117) making an appropriation for the extension and enlargement of the United States custom-house at Kansas City, Mo.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FLORIDA INDIAN WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The second morning hour for the consideration of bills begins at half-past 1 o'clock.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3877) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. That is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I am not well this morning, and if I can get unanimous consent to lay this bill aside for the present, so that the committee will not lose its place, I would be glad to do so.

The SPEAKER. That is, to pass the Committee on Claims over for to-day.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Yes; and the bill to be taken up on the next call of committees for consideration of bills—that the bill shall be passed over without losing its place.

Mr. DINGLEY. To be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Yes; to be taken up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee on Claims is passed over for to-day, it may be that some other committee will have the floor to-morrow by reason of failure of the committee to finish its business to-day; but the understanding is it will be in order after that business is disposed of.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Yes; that is the request I make, and it is because I am not well to-day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The Committee on War Claims was called.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on War Claims have under consideration the bill known as the "Fourth of July claims bill," and it is not quite ready for consideration. We expected the Committee on Claims to occupy their hour to-day. I ask, therefore, by direction of the committee, that next Friday week, the 4th of February, immediately after the reading of the Journal, or before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, that that bill be taken up and considered. I think it will occupy but little time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Committee on Private Land Claims was called.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to call up the bill (H. R. 2981) to abrogate the powers of the executive officers of the United States in allowing indemnity locations or scrip for confirmed, unsatisfied private land claims, under section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 11, pages 294 and 295, chapter 81), and to vest that power in the courts of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases of confirmation by the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858, entitled "An act to provide for the location of certain confirmed private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," and in all cases of final decisions in favor of land claimants made by the commissioners under section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1807, entitled "An act respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," or where any private land claim had been confirmed by Congress before June 2, 1858, and the same, in whole or in part, had not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation, or for any reason whatsoever, other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, the confirmees, or their heirs or legal representatives, may proceed by petition against the United States for certificates of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied, in any district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction any part of such claim may lie; and the petition shall be verified by the oath of the petitioners, and conform to the practice of the courts in cases arising under the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes," and the acts reviving or amending said act; and the attorney of the United States for such district shall defend against the same for the United States; and the case shall be adjudged as equity and justice may require; and if it shall appear to the court, upon satisfactory proof, that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, the court shall decree accordingly and order certificates of location to be issued to the petitioners in the manner provided by an act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives, which certificates shall be devisable, assignable, locatable, and patentable according to the provisions of said act of January 28, 1879."

SEC. 2. That the decree so rendered, whether for or against the United States, shall be final, unless the area or aggregate of the certificates of location claimed in the petition shall exceed, at a valuation of $1.25 an acre the sum of $5,000, in which case, if the decree be against the United States, an appeal may be entered to the Supreme Court of the United States; and if it be against the petitioners, they may take an appeal directly to that court, as of right and course, without affidavit or security other than for costs; and the appeal shall be adjudged de novo in the Supreme Court, as in other cases of appeals thereto in chancery, and as the principle of this act may require; and the decision of the Supreme Court shall be final: Provided, That said appeal shall be taken within ninety days after the entry of such decree, and if not then taken said decree shall be final.

SEC. 3. That so much of the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858, chapter 81, or of any other act of Congress, as authorizes executive officers of the United States, in their judgment and discretion, to allow indemnity locations, floats, scrip, or certificates of location on behalf of confirmed private land claims, which come within the purview of this act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I would like to have the report accompanying that bill read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor. The report can be read in his time only by his consent.

Mr. THOMPSON. It may be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON) was read, as follows:

The bill does not seek to create new rights, but simply to change the remedy by which existing rights may be perfected and established. The act of June 2, 1858, confirms certain private land claims in the States of Missouri and Louisiana, and then provides, among other things—

"That in all cases of confirmation by this act, or where any private land claim has been confirmed by Congress, and the same, in whole or in part, has not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation, or for any reason whatsoever, other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the district in which such claim was situated, upon satisfactory proof that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, a certificate of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied."

Under the fourth section of the act, and by virtue of the provisions of section 453 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the action of the surveyor-general in issuing such certificates of location must be submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for approval, and, in event of his disapproval, an appeal lies to the Secretary of the Interior by virtue of sections 441, 453, and 2478 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It will be seen, therefore, that in determining whether certificates of location should issue, these officers, the surveyor-general, Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior, must pass upon the following questions, to wit:

1. Has the claim been confirmed?

2. Has the land covered by the claim so confirmed been disposed of by the United States, leaving the claim unsatisfied, or is it unsatisfied for any reason which entitles the claimant to indemnity from the United States?

3. Is the claimant the confirmee or the true legal representative of the confirmee?

These are questions which require the machinery and procedure of the courts for their safe and satisfactory determination. The proceeding before the surveyor-general is neither safe nor satisfactory. There is no machinery for the bringing in and examination of witnesses; there are no pleadings; the United States is not represented by counsel, and the investigation is practically an ex parte one, carried on at the instance of the claimant.

The questions, both of law and fact, are often nice and difficult, and should be submitted to judicial decision.

This bill proposes to transfer the determination of these questions to the district courts of the United States, and provides that the attorney of the United States for the district shall appear and defend for the United States. The public land commission appointed under acts of March 3, 1879, and June 16, 1880, recommended this transfer of jurisdiction, and your committee do now recommend it.

Notwithstanding the law of June 2, 1858, has been on the statute-books for nearly thirty years, yet but few cases, comparatively, have been disposed of under it, the larger part of the cases coming within its provisions never having been presented for determination. Your committee is of the opinion, therefore, that some limit should be placed upon the right to proceed against the United States for the indemnity scrip or certificates authorized by this law, and recommend that the bill be amended by adding the following section thereto, to wit:

"SEC. 3. That all claims which are by the provisions of this act authorized to be prosecuted shall, after five years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to persons under any legal disability to sue at the time of the taking effect of this act; but all such persons shall commence the prosecution of their claims by filing the petition hereinbefore provided for within one year after the removal of the disability, or be forever barred."

And that it be further amended by striking out of the first line of section 3 thereof, as it now stands, the words "Sec. 3," and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "Sec. 4."

And that it be further amended by adding in the twenty-third line of the first section thereof, after the word "petitioners," the words "or their agents and attorneys;" and your committee recommend that the bill, when so amended, do pass.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say for the information of the House, with reference to this bill, that a great many private land claims originating in the State of Louisiana, covering large tracts of territory there, under grants of the Spanish Government before we acquired the territory, are affected by the provisions of this bill.

The Government surveyed many of these lands and sold them and granted patents, and under a law passed in 1858 the claimants, under these Spanish grants, were authorized to appear before the surveyor-general of the State of Louisiana, and upon making proof that the claim was one which had been conferred by Congress, and that the lands had been disposed of by the United States, were entitled to procure from the surveyor-general a certificate of location for an equal quantity of land to be located elsewhere upon Government lands.

The present bill provides simply that the jurisdiction heretofore vested in the surveyor-general of the State of Louisiana shall be transferred to the courts of the United States, and that these investigations shall be prosecuted in the courts and not before the surveyor-general. It provides further that the United States district attorney shall appear and represent the interests of the United States Government. Heretofore the proceeding has been practically ex parte before the surveyor-general at the instance of the claimant, without the United States being in any way represented. This bill, therefore, provides that the United States district attorney shall appear and represent the interests of the United States. It also provides a limitation upon the presentation of claims of this character. Thirty years have passed since the act to which I have referred was enacted, and but few applications have been made under it.

Now, your committee were of opinion that some limitation should be fixed within which application for certificates of location should be made; and we have fixed the limitation of five years within which the applications must be made to the courts of the United States of that district, or be forever barred. It is important that this should be done.

The titles to lands, large quantities in Louisiana, are in such a condition because of these outstanding private land claims that it affects the settlement of lands to a very large extent.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. About how much?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not able to state, but a considerable amount is covered by these Spanish grants.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does this apply to all private land claims?

Mr. THOMPSON. To those only in Louisiana and Missouri.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And parties, settlers, who are affected by this will be permitted to take lands elsewhere instead of those which are affected by these grants?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. Who issues the certificates?

Mr. THOMPSON. The surveyor-general. I will say in a word that all there is in this bill is to transfer the jurisdiction from the surveyor-general to the United States courts. The surveyor-general under the act of 1858 issues the certificates of location whenever the application is made to him and a proper case is shown.

Mr. RYAN. Does this clothe the court with more powers than are possessed by the surveyor-general?

Mr. THOMPSON. It provides that it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney to appear and represent the interests of the Government before the court.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Whereas under the present system it is practically an ex parte proceeding before the surveyor-general at the instance of the claimant.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir; the United States not being represented. I will say that this has been before the Land Office for many years, and they have recommended its enactment into law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the present Secretary of the Interior and the present Commissioner of the General Land Office have recommended the passage of this bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know whether they have or not.

Mr. BRUMM. Can you give an estimate of the number of acres involved?

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Has this bill been submitted to the present Commissioner of the General Land Office or to the present Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not prepared to say. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] introduced the bill, and it is practically a copy of the bill which has been before Congress a good many times; and it has had the approval of the land commission that was appointed in 1880, and of the Land Office from time to time, and it seems to me it speaks for itself. It does not grant any new rights.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The bill is a very long one, and can not be understood in all its bearings unless some time be allowed to investigate it.

Mr. THOMPSON. As I have said, the bill does not create any new rights.

Mr. RYAN. Nor confer any greater power on the court?

Mr. THOMPSON. It confers no greater power. It takes the power from the surveyor-general that he now has and gives the same power to the United States court. In addition to that it requires the district attorneys to appear and represent the interests of the United States, and we add to that a limitation to the effect that all applications must come in within the next five years or be forever barred.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understand from the reading of the bill that in certain contingencies parties would be entitled to take this indemnity land who are not so entitled now. Why not restrict your bill to simply a change of forum from the surveyor-general to the United States court?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is not that the effect of the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. That I understand to be the effect of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The trouble is the courts are not bound by what we say would be the effect of the bill. If the bill were drawn so as to simply restrict it to that operation there could be no objection to it. But I understood it went on and provided that on certain proof being made parties might go and take indemnity lands; perhaps reviving rights which may have been lost heretofore.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the bill makes no change in the existing law whatsoever, except it be to incorporate some of the provisions of the law of 1879 authorizing the division of the land covered by certificates in quantities to suit the claimant. There is a provision of that kind; where the certificate of location would cover, say, a thousand acres of land, the party can have that subdivided. There is a provision of that sort in the law of 1879, and the provisions of that law are incorporated in this. And except in that respect and in the transfer of jurisdiction from the surveyors-general to the courts of the United States it does not change the law of 1858.

Mr. BRUMM. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is any objection, so far as he knows, to substituting a money consideration for land which the Government may not be able to return? We have established a precedent here, in the Gaines case, of substituting money for land. Is there any objection to that same proviso being added to this bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will understand this bill only contemplates the transfer of jurisdiction from certain officers to courts, and does not deal with the question of issuing the scrip or not issuing it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to offer an amendment which perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] has in his mind, or would approve, considering what he has just said? I desire to offer as an amendment a proviso to come in at the end of section 2. I think it will not interfere with the objects sought by the committee in reporting this bill.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Add at the end of section 2, the following:

"Provided, however, That such certificates of location so decreed by the court shall not be located on any land or lands within the limits of any incorporated city, town, or village."

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Do you accept it?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let it be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we ought to go further, and secure that the location should be within the limits of the State within which the original grant was located.

Mr. NELSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a few questions. I have not had time to examine this bill, but it strikes me under its provisions the effect of it is to issue a lot of new land-scrip and give that new land-scrip other and better qualities than a good many owners of such now have. Is that the effect of it?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not.

Mr. NELSON. Does it not allow owners, whether of Valentine or Supreme Court scrip—and these scrips can be of limited quantities, some on surveyed, some on unsurveyed lands—does it not allow the owners of such scrip to bunch all of these into one kind and make a new scrip that is assignable and can be hawked about as our agricultural scrip could be?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not, sir.

Mr. NELSON. But is not the effect of this bill to give some of these scrip owners rights which they do not now have? I will say one thing further, if the gentleman will allow me—I would be glad to have so important a bill as this referred to either the Committee on the Public Lands or the Committee on the Judiciary; I see that it has not been considered by either.

Mr. THOMPSON. It has been referred to and reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and it affects private land claims only.

Mr. NELSON. It does more than that. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. THOMPSON. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman when he gets through, but I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to make a speech. That is not my purpose. I simply wish to say that while the bill satisfies these private claims, it also provides for the issue of a kind of scrip which is to be available anywhere on the public lands.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It ought to be confined to the State of the original grant.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I have to say, as I have already said, that I do not understand this bill to change the law of 1858 in any respect, except that it transfers jurisdiction from the surveyor-general of Louisiana to the United States courts. I call attention to this provision:

And if it shall appear to the court, upon satisfactory proof, that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, the court shall decree accordingly and order certificates of location to be issued to the petitioners in the manner provided by an act of Congress approved January 23, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives, which certificates shall be devisable, assignable, locatable, and patentable according to the provisions of said act of January 23, 1879.

I do not know that by the law of 1858 the certificates of location issuable under that law could be assigned, located, and devised according to the provisions of the act of 1879, and this may change the law of 1858 in that respect. Beyond that, however, there is no change in existing law, except the transfer of the jurisdiction to issue these certificates from the surveyor-general to the courts of the United States.

The bill does not authorize the issuing of any scrip or certificates of location that are not now authorized to be issued.

Mr. NELSON. No; but it says that these new court certificates shall be locatable as specified in the act of 1879; and that act gives general authority to locate them anywhere on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. I remember very well that in a case in Louisiana, where a person had an old French claim and scrip was issued to him for it, he was unable to satisfy the claim there, so he came up and located it on lands within my district; and, under this act, all these claimants could locate their scrip or certificates anywhere on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that these certificates which may be issued now by the surveyor-general of Louisiana, under the law of 1858, can be located anywhere on public lands that are subject to entry?

Mr. HOLMAN. The act seems to be intended to apply to certain grants referred to and mentioned in the act of 1858, and the third section simply proposes to carry out the confirmation of the grants there named. Now, what information has the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON], or the Committee on Private Land Claims, from the Commissioner of Public Lands, as to the reasons, if any, why the powers conferred upon him by the third section of the act have not been carried out?

Mr. THOMPSON. The power to issue these certificates of location?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, the proceeding before the surveyor-general has been found to be so cumbersome as to make it almost impossible to do anything there. The rules and regulations under which a claim must be presented and prosecuted are such that it is practically impossible ever to reach a conclusion.

In the report of the land commission, which was appointed, I think in 1880, the whole subject is discussed, and this bill grows out of the recommendations of that land commission, that the powers of the surveyor-general should be transferred to the courts, in order that these claims might be settled.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the recommendation apply to those claims specified in the act of 1858?

Mr. THOMPSON. The act of 1858 covers specific grants in Louisiana and Missouri that have been confirmed by the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, specific grants; but does the recommendation to which the gentleman has referred apply to those specific grants? Has the gentleman from Ohio the report of that commission at hand?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that there will be no objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], for we all know what has been the history of this land scrip. There is also a further provision which I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] will not object to, namely, that the scrip issued under the authority of this act, if any shall be issued, shall be located in the States in which the original grants were situated.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the language of my proviso is such that it could not easily be changed to include the idea indicated by the gentleman; but if this proviso be first adopted, then the gentleman could offer a second proviso. I certainly should vote for a proposition embodying the idea which the gentleman from Indiana now expresses; but I hope that my proviso will not be imperiled by undertaking to incorporate the gentleman's proposition as a part of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The two provisions are entirely in harmony.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Perfectly.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment of the committee to section 2 of the bill was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to that amendment.

The amendment of Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was read, as follows:

At the end of the section add the following:
"Provided, however, That such certificates of location so decreed by the court shall not be located upon any land or lands within the limits of any incorporated city, town, or village."

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was read, as follows:

Add the following words:
"And shall be located in the State within the limits of which the original grant was situated."

Mr. NELSON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to include these words: "and nowhere else."

Mr. HOLMAN. That language is unnecessary.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, as amended was adopted.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 25, noes 69.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, and Mr. THOMPSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 139.

So the motion of Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, was not agreed to.

Mr. HALL. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "unless," in the second line of section 2, down to and including the words "five thousand dollars," in the fifth line, and inserting the words "an appeal be taken."

The section as it now stands forbids appeals where the amount involved is less than $5,000. The effect of my amendment is to allow appeals to be taken by the Government or the claimant in any case. This amendment is offered after consultation with a number of gentlemen, and I think it improves the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNCONFIRMED PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Private Land Claims is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. SADLER. I have been instructed by that committee to call up from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7214) to authorize the examination, approval, and patenting of certain unconfirmed private land claims in the States of Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and in the States of Alabama and Mississippi south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, which is as follows:

Whereas there are still outstanding unconfirmed many private land-claims within the States and parts of States above-named, having their alleged origin in some form of grant, concession, permission to settle, order of survey, or otherwise, under the French, British, or Spanish government, before the cession of the territory to the United States, or during the period when any such government claimed sovereignty or had the actual possession of the district or territories in which the lands so claimed are situated, the evidences of which in some cases have been lost or destroyed, and it is important, as well for the public interests as to protect the rights of claimants under the obligations imposed upon this Government by the treaties of cession, that said claims should be adjusted and settled according to justice and equity, and in conformity to the laws, usages, and customs of the parent Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the register and the receiver at the several land-offices of the United States within the States and parts of States aforesaid, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office if there be no such land offices within the said States (the act of June 19, 1878, 55014, 20th Statutes, 175, and first supplement to Revised Statutes, 380, page 14), be, and are, authorized and required to hear, examine, and decide as to the validity, locality, and extent of such claims, upon the same being presented to them in the manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the claimant or claimants, at the commencement of the proceedings herein authorized, shall present to the register and receiver of the district within which the land claimed is situated, or to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in case provided for in section 1 of this act, a petition, verified by the oath of one or more of the claimants, with an abstract showing the title or the right by occupancy under which the claim is made, which petition shall contain a statement of the origin of the claims under the former Government, its history as to date of settlement, manner and extent of occupancy and cultivation, and the improvements thereon, if any there be, as far back as the knowledge and information of the claimant may extend. Claimants may appear in said proceedings by attorney, but the verification of the petition herein required shall be by one or more of the claimants in person: Provided, That the filing of a claim in good faith as provided in this act shall have the effect of lis pendens as to all persons subsequently entering upon the lands, or any portion thereof, embraced within such claim.

SEC. 3. That the officers to whom claims may be presented under this act are authorized to issue subpœnas for witnesses, on application of claimants, in cases contemplated by this act; to administer oaths to parties and witnesses; to take the testimony of witnesses produced by claimants, and to cross-examine such witnesses on the part of the United States; to issue subpœnas on their own motion for such witnesses as they may judge necessary, and examine the same in the presence of or on sufficient notice to claimants, who may cross-examine such witnesses; and to take the testimony of any witness by commission who resides more than 20 miles from the place where such officers hold their office, as now required under the homestead laws of the United States. Witnesses shall receive the same fees for travel and attendance under this act, and under the same rules as to payment, as are allowed to witnesses therefor in the courts of the State in which the investigation is held, to be paid by the party in whose behalf they are procured or required to attend.

SEC. 4. That the said officers shall make a complete record, for preservation in their office, of the cases presented under this act, by filing therein in each case the petition and statement presented, the testimony given and produced, whether oral or documentary (and shall require any documents offered which are in a foreign language to be accompanied by a correct translation into English, furnished by the party offering the same), and of their opinion and decision thereupon, approving or disapproving the claim, whether in whole or in part, annex the several papers in proper form, in the order of their production, and appropriately certify the same as the record in the case. In case of claims presented to the register and receiver under this act, if they shall disagree as to the decisions to be made, they shall enter separate opinions and decisions in the record, and, having closed the case, shall make a full transcript of the record and certify the same to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 5. That for the services required of them by this act the register and receiver shall be entitled, jointly, to the following fees: For taking and reducing the testimony to writing, 15 cents for every one hundred words, and for transcribing and certifying the record, 10 cents for every one hundred words, to be paid by the claimants in each case presented, for which a sufficient deposit shall be made with the receiver at the commencement of the proceedings.

SEC. 6. That the persons presenting claims as herein provided may have the same approved, though they may not be able to make direct proof of the original title, nor to connect themselves by a complete chain of title therewith, where it shall sufficiently appear by circumstances shown that the claim had its origin under one of the foreign Governments as aforementioned, and be satisfactorily proved that the claimants, and those under whom they claim, have held actual, continuous, and undisputed possession of the land claimed under such claim, and have occupied and cultivated the land, by themselves, their servants, agents, or tenants, for thirty years next preceding the presentation of the claim: Provided, That approval under this section shall only extend to and cover the land so proved to be held in actual possession and occupancy.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall examine the case upon the transcript return by the register and receiver; and if, in his opinion, the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, he may require a further report from the register and receiver touching any matter in the case indicated by him, or may direct further testimony to be taken therein, in which case the register and receiver may subpœna the necessary witnesses and take record, transcribe, certify, and return the additional matter of testimony so directed and taken as in the original proceeding.

SEC. 8. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall make his decision upon the cases returned as aforesaid, and communicate the same to the register and receiver, who shall give notice thereof to the claimants interested therein, or their attorney of record. If such decision, or the decision in any case originally presented to the said Commissioner, be adverse to the claimants, they may appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Interior; and if he approve the claim, the Commissioner shall at once submit the case, with his decision, to the Secretary; and all proceedings under this act shall conform, so far as practical, to the established rules of practice governing the Interior Department and its subordinate officers in land cases for the time being.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior shall render his decision upon the case, which decision shall be final as between the claimant and the United States; and upon approval of a claim by him, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if a survey of such claim be necessary, shall direct the proper officer to make and return a survey in accordance with the approval thereof; and such officer, after notice to all parties interested, or their attorney of record, shall execute, or cause to be executed, such direction.

SEC. 10. That upon the return of such survey the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, if in his judgment necessary to conform the same to the approval of the claim, direct amendment thereof, or may order a new survey; and upon the return of the survey conforming to the approval of the claim he shall approve the same, and cause a patent to be issued to the claimants in accordance therewith, which patent shall have the effect only of a quit-claim or relinquishment on the part of the United States, and shall not affect valid adverse rights.

SEC. 11. That if any of the land embraced within the limits of a private claim finally approved under this act shall have been disposed of by the United States in such manner that it can not be patented to the claimant, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue, in legal subdivisions as near as practical, certificates of location to the claimant for a quantity of land equal to the land so disposed of, in the manner provided by an act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain landscrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patent in the name of the locator or his legal representatives," which certificate shall be divisible, assignable, locatable, and patentable according to the provisions of said act (see 20 Statutes, 274): Provided, That the benefits of this section shall apply only to those lands proved to be held in actual possession and occupancy as provided in section 6 of this act.

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect upon its passage, and be continued in force until repealed; and all claims filed before such repeal shall be examined and disposed of as if no repeal had taken place; and until final decision thereon all claims within the purview of this act shall be reserved from all adverse disposition whatsoever; but all such claims which shall not have been filed for confirmation before the proper officers within three years after the passage of this act, or which, having been so filed, shall, by reason of the negligence of the claimant, not be prosecuted to final decision within five years after filing the same, shall, upon the expiration of said periods, become part of the public lands of the United States, subject to like disposition as all other public lands of the United States in the same State or part of State: Provided, That in case of an application, within three years from the passage of this act, to file on any claim within the purview of this act under the pre-emption laws, or to enter any part of the same, the applicant shall at the time inform, by writing, the officer to whom the application may be made, of the post-office addresses of the persons occupying such claim as owners, or of such addresses of one or more of the non-resident claimants if there be no such occupants; and such officers shall at once, by registered letter, inform such persons of such application, and warn them to present such claim within six months from such notice for confirmation under this act; and in case such persons neglect so to present their claim, then, at the end of such six months' notice, the claim shall become part of the public lands of the United States, subject to disposition as all other public lands of the United States in the same State or parts of State; and until final decision thereon all lands embraced within such claim filed within the purview of this act shall be reserved from all adverse disposition by the Government; but all such claims which shall not have been presented and filed for confirmation before the proper officers within three years after the passage of this act, or which, having been filed, shall, by reason of the negligence of the claimants, not be prosecuted to final decision within five years after the filing of the same, shall, after the expiration of said periods, become and be barred, and the lands therein embraced be freed from reservation and regarded in all respects as public lands, subject to disposition as all other public lands in the same State or part of the State: Provided, That in case of an application, within three years from the passage of this act, to enter or locate a homestead upon or otherwise acquire the title to any land embraced within any grant or concession within the purview of this act, under the pre-emption or other laws of the United States, the applicant may at the time inform, by writing, the officer to whom the application should legally be made to enter, pre-empt, or acquire such land, of the post-office addresses of the persons or claimants, occupying such lands under such concession or grant, or if not in possession of non-residents, the addresses of such persons; and such officer shall at once notify and inform such persons, by registered letter deposited in the United States mail, properly addressed, of the presentation of such application of such person or persons to enter, pre-empt, or acquire said lands, and require such claimant to present his or their claim to said grant or concession, within six months from date of such notice, for confirmation under this act; and in case such claimant or claimants shall fail or neglect to comply with said notice and present their claims within said six months, then said claim as to the lands so sought to be entered, pre-empted, or acquired, shall be barred, and such person entering, or pre-empting, or otherwise attempting to acquire land shall be permitted to proceed and perfect his title under the laws applicable thereto.

Before the reading of the bill was concluded the hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees expired.

Mr. SADLER. I ask unanimous consent that, as this bill will come up to-morrow morning, it be printed in full in the RECORD, although the reading has not been completed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HATCH. Pending that motion, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill under the special order of the House.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the special order. The question will first be taken on the latter motion.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the Chair to rule that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri has precedence.

The SPEAKER. It has, as the bill which the gentleman from Missouri proposes to consider has been made a special order.

Mr. WILLIS. I give notice, then, if that motion be voted down, I will make the motion I have stated.

The SPEAKER. If the motion of the gentleman from Missouri be voted down, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky will still be pending.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HATCH, there were—ayes 53, noes 69.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask for the yeas and nays. This is is a very important question.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will not insist upon the call for the yeas and nays. Whenever a majority of the House shall consent, I want to take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill; but I do not want to consume time in roll-calls, because thereby the consideration of important measures like this is simply postponed so much longer.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Nor do I wish to consume time unnecessarily; but the measure from the Committee on Agriculture is much more important than the river and harbor bill, and I desire to have a record.

Mr. HATCH. I concur with the gentleman in believing that our bill is the more important; but the majority of the House do not agree with us.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. HATCH was rejected.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The question recurred on Mr. WILLIS'S motion, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HEPBURN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 4.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. WILLIS.

The House again divided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The tellers will count my vote in the affirmative.

The tellers reported—ayes 156, noes 7.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The committee have not yet passed from the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named:

Improving harbor at Rockland, Me.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. At the time the first paragraph of the bill was read on Saturday I was struggling to get the attention of the then occupant of the chair for the purpose of moving an amendment to that first paragraph of the bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] and the Chair, recognizing the fact the first paragraph was still pending, permitted me to offer the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I was presiding in the chair at the time, and know the first paragraph is pending.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not raise any question as to the fact, and hope the gentleman will be permitted to move his amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Texas has made a correct statement.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I offer the following as a substitute for that portion of the bill between lines 2 and 8:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $7,430,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which may be expended by the Secretary of War as he may deem necessary, either for the repair, preservation, construction, or completion of such public improvements of rivers and harbors as shall in his judgment afford practical and important facilities for the transportation by water of interstate commerce.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amendment looks to a different method from that heretofore followed in making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The sum agreed upon by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, as formulated in this bill, is $7,430,000. The amendment I have just offered appropriates the same sum, but it provides—

That sum shall be expended by the Secretary of War as he shall deem necessary, either for the repair, preservation, construction, or completion of such public improvement of rivers and harbors as shall in his judgment afford practical and important facilities for the transportation by water of interstate commerce.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the change proposed by the amendment is radical. It looks to making some high officer of the Government responsible for the expenditure of whatever sum Congress may appropriate for the improvement of rivers and harbors. And I can see no reason why the present administration, especially when it claims to be an administration of economy and reform, should not be held responsible for the expenditure of such sums as are given for the improvement of our water-ways.

It seems to me that it would be better if the Secretary of War should adopt some general plan, and proceed year by year in execution of that plan, for the purpose of affording to the country the development of those water-ways and the improvement of those harbors which would best subserve the necessities of existing commerce as well as provide for future interstate commerce.

By the adoption of such a plan many results would follow. First, there would be an immediate development of water-ways with respect to the current commerce of the nation. And for one I would hail such a development, such practical improvement of facilities for water transportation as would speedily give to us increased checks upon the charges made by the railway system.

Another advantage would be that the Secretary of War, acting upon a matured plan suggested, say, by the Chief of Engineers or the Engineer Department, would naturally first consider those works which were of the most importance to commerce; would first develop those water-ways which are of the most importance to the commerce of to-day, and having once completed such works, say, at Chicago, or at New York, or at Boston, or at San Francisco, would then allot subsequent appropriations to streams and harbors of minor importance, and in the order of their importance as related to the commerce of to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RYAN. If I may be permitted, I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will not occupy much time. I desire to thank my colleague for his courtesy.

There had been expended up to 1882 the sum of $105,000,000. Most of that has been expended since 1865. There has been expended of this sum on the Mississippi River up to 1882 $19,536,000, and several millions have been expended since. In other words, we have, chiefly within the last fifteen or twenty years, made an expenditure of more than $125,000,000 on rivers and harbors, and each year we are continuing to increase that amount by similar expenditures. The expenditure up to 1882 by States is as follows:

Alabama	$956,142	New Hampshire	$175,500
Arkansas	315,000	New Jersey	987,496
California	1,493,428	New York	9,539,973
Connecticut	1,527,448	North Carolina	2,261,202
Delaware	3,043,636	Ohio	2,857,031
Florida	680,352	Oregon	649,305
Georgia	1,364,064	Pennsylvania	1,067,101
Idaho Territory	10,000	Rhode Island	733,613
Illinois	2,352,304	South Carolina	931,342
Indiana	786,198	Tennessee	85,500
Iowa	2,499	Texas	2,166,133
Kentucky	367,500	Vermont	545,311
Louisiana	147,809	Virginia	1,683,375
Maine	1,404,889	Washington Ter	5,500
Maryland	1,485,769	West Virginia	1,387,587
Massachusetts	2,928,779	Wisconsin	4,616,495
Michigan	7,828,356	District of Columbia	253,202
Minnesota	447,500	Miscellaneous	38,349,108
Missouri	22,000
Mississippi	295,175	Total	105,796,403

And yet, Mr. Chairman, we have no plan. The present method is wholly devoid of system. There are three hundred and twenty-five Representatives in the House and seventy-six members of the Senate. The proper committees of these two bodies have the preparation of these bills; and I wish to congratulate the House upon the ability, assiduity, and, I think, general fairness under the existing method displayed by the members of the present River and Harbor Committee, and I certainly desire to express my sense of gratification at the uniform courtesy and amiability of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, that committee must necessarily take into account the conflicting desires and interests of the three hundred and twenty-five members of the House. They are appealing, each one of them, for some particular improvement. The committee have great trouble in reaching a decision; presently they do reach it. Is their bill, in view of the fact I have stated, constructed upon a general plan looking to the importance of providing facilities for the present or future commerce of the country in the order of the importance of the several rivers and harbors requiring such facilities? Oh! no. It necessarily cannot be so formulated. It is merely an average of conflicting local demands.

The proposition presented in the amendment, then, would look to the adoption of a general plan which would be wise, which would be effective, for the execution of which the Secretary of War and the Administration may be responsible; and such plan once determined upon we could then go forward and year by year appropriate such sums as, in the judgment of Congress, were necessary to be given for the development of water-ways.

For myself, there is no one who more earnestly desires a steady development of our water-way system for the express purpose of regulating the extortionate rates now charged by railway carriers than do I; and were this bill constructed on such a principle and for such a purpose, in my judgment—for in such a matter as this gentlemen have the right to differ in judgment—but if in my judgment it were constructed on that principle, and to attain that object, I would most heartily favor the bill.

But I can not support it in its present form and arrangement of details, for the simple reason that while there are a few such cases in the bill, there are very many which are simply what I may call the fringe about the great mantle of commerce; some insignificant little stream is to be improved, on which a large amount is to be expended; a stream not sufficient to do anything more than float logs down, and up which you could not by any possibility drive a 50-foot scow. For that reason I can not support the bill in its present structure; whereas some such general principle as already indicated, a broad and comprehensive plan of improvement, by which we could enter upon the development of our water-ways, will receive, I believe, the approbation of the great majority of the people of the country, and certainly my support here. For one, I am willing to vote, in addition to the sum named in the bill, $5,000,000 for the deepening and lengthening of the locks on the Erie Canal, in order that lake transportation may directly and profitably reach New York. I am in favor of constructing the Hennepin Canal, and in favor of making or developing such great water-ways as shall give to us increased facilities, and result in reducing the cost of railway transportation to our people. I am in favor of such improvements for the benefit of the great commerce of the country in all parts of the Union.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This is the last time that I shall accept the courtesy on this occasion, and am obliged to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas if he is in favor of improving the Missouri or Mississippi River?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In reply to my friend from Missouri I wish to state that his inquiry raises this question: What to-day are the channels through which ebb and flow our great national commerce? Why, from the whole region north of Saint Louis its movement is east and west, and from the region south of that point it is northeast and southwest; and in providing water transportation which shall practically and directly benefit that commerce, you must keep in mind the great flow and direction of the commerce itself. That, of course, is a general proposition, and upon that general proposition I would not be in favor of going, as I think this bill does, to the extent of appropriating some one and one-half million dollars to the improvement of the Mississippi River; and for the simple reason that the relative proportion of the commerce affected by the Mississippi River is very much less than the volume of commerce in other portions of the continent.

I would like to say to my friend from Missouri, furthermore, that I am heartily in favor of developing and improving the navigation of the Missouri River, and I voted for the appropriation of $250,000, I think, for that purpose. But, having done that, when it is stated upon the floor that this appropriation has chiefly been used at points where railway companies have railway bridges, for the purpose of riprapping the abutments, and preventing the railway property from being swept away, I say, that being true, if true then most emphatically am I opposed, under the guise of appropriating money to deepen and improve the channel of the Missouri River, in order that wheat may be carried down at a lower rate, to vote money to benefit the railway companies which have money enough to protect their own property, and thus permit them again, as they have done in other cases, to "yank" out the whole sum and slap it up in the shape of riprap works for their own benefit.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Does the gentleman assert that this money has been spent in that way? He said "if that statement be true." Does he assert it is true?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], when discussing this bill some few days ago, to have made that statement, and it is upon his authority that I have repeated it. If the statement be true, then such a use of that $250,000 appropriated for improving the channel was simply a bald-headed outrage practiced for the benefit of those railroad companies.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Do I understand the gentleman to intimate that that is true?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The gentleman from Missouri can ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who is in his seat, whether it is true or not. It was he who made the statement, and being of age he is quite competent to speak for himself.

The committee will observe that the same sum which is proposed by the bill before us, $7,430,000, is also proposed by this amendment. Were the amendment adopted, then, of course, we need give no further consideration to the bill, and very much time probably would be saved, so that the House might consider the pleuro-pneumonia bill, in which I take the deepest interest, and other important measures. And I submit to my friend, the chairman of the committee, that this amendment is not inimical in any way to the great work of the improvement of rivers and harbors. It is simply proposing a new method, that is all, and in my judgment a better method.

Mr. BAYNE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] proceeds I should like to understand precisely the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. Does he propose to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert in lieu thereof so and so?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I propose to strike out lines 3 to 8, inclusive, as follows:

That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the sum of $7,430,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which may be expended by the Secretary of War as he shall deem necessary either for the repair, preservation, construction, or completion of such public improvements of rivers and harbors as shall in his judgment afford practical and important facilities for the transportation by water of interstate commerce.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman leave the balance of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think if the committee should agree to the amendment, in all probability, when the next item came up the good sense of the committee would reject it, and so on to the end of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman proposes his amendment as a substitute, I would like to know it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I propose it not as a substitute for the bill, but for those six lines, as just read.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman propose, by the provisions of his amendment, to prohibit the transportation of such commerce as does not pass out of one State into another State on such rivers as may be improved by this expenditure?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Interstate commerce necessarily includes the commerce which starts in one State and passes into another. The term interstate commerce practically includes all commerce, because anything that starts from the head of a river which is wholly in one State finds a market in some other State. That is interstate commerce, and the objection of the gentleman does not hold good as against this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If my amendment be adopted we can then reject the remainder of the bill.

Mr. REED. What is your hostility to foreign commerce?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. None in the world.

Mr. REED. Why do you exclude that?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not exclude it. I suppose before the commerce gets to the seashore it must have passed over more than one State, unless it originated, say, in the State of Maine, but I will so modify my amendment as to obviate the point raised by the gentleman.

Mr. BAYNE. I am somewhat surprised at the gentleman from Kansas offering a proposition of this sort. I am especially surprised in view of his legislative and political course, which has always heretofore been against monopoly and against centralization. If there be any proposition which is full of centralism it is the one he now submits for the vote of the committee; to place in the hands of one individual the vast distribution and expenditure of seven or eight millions of dollars, and to be followed, if this precedent be established, by a bill next year of probably $15,000,000. This is a proposition for centralizing power which I did not think would have come from the gentleman from Kansas.

In all appropriation bills the tendency has constantly been to have Congress appropriate for each particular item, to designate its purpose. That has been the course urged and pursued by my colleague, Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee. That plan has been pursued with decided advantage to the Government, and is clearly in the interest of judicious and safe administration.

But this progress in the direction of a knowledge on the part of Congress how each dollar of the public money shall be expended would be wiped out in an instant by the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas.

Moreover, there is no branch of this whole Government that maintains a direct responsibility to the people, the sources of sovereignty and power in this country, so much as the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives is elected every two years, and the people pass upon the fitness and qualifications of their candidates. If an appropriation bill passes which provides for expenditures it should not contain, the Representative who votes for such an appropriation is responsible to his constituency. His constituency is not slow to perceive such dereliction, as is abundantly testified by many experiences in our history.

But, sir, in place of maintaining that responsibility, the most direct and immediate in this Government of ours, the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas would pass the responsibility to a corps of engineers who have a different tenure of office, who hold office until they are placed on the retired-list, and who would practically direct the expenditure of this money. It would be applied nominally under the direction of the Secretary of War, but really at the suggestion of the various engineers located in different sections of the country.

Why, sir, I think that to indorse a proposition like that, and to substitute a responsibility of that kind for the direct and immediate responsibility which rests upon us, would be taking a step backward instead of going forward in the direction we have heretofore gone with reference to expending the money of the people. The scheme has been mooted at different times to amend the Constitution so as to give the President of the United States power to veto particular items in an appropriation bill. If ever that should come up for consideration, and the House of Representatives should yield to it, I should almost despair of the perpetuity of this Republic, because that would be conferring the power upon one individual instead of leaving it to rest where it should rest, in the hands of the House of Representatives, the body which originates all bills for the expenditure of the public money, and for the raising of revenue to support the Government. I therefore am surprised when a gentleman of the usually clear head and, I know, of the honest convictions and good purposes of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] proposes an amendment which would take away from him, from his constituents, and from the constituents of every member upon this floor, the opportunity to pass upon the appropriations in the river and harbor bill—a change which sooner or later would result in depriving this House of not only the knowledge of the way the public treasure is disbursed, but the objects to which it should be applied. The people are very close to this branch of the General Government. We should evade no duty we can properly perform.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to move to amend the amendment. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] wishes to amend the amendment, I am willing to yield to him.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to say a few words with regard to this amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment, by striking out the sum named, and inserting in lieu thereof the sum of "$10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But I desire to discuss the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the floor, and can proceed.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The argument of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is ingenious, but it is not sound. It is true that this House has been in the habit of making special appropriations for all public purposes, and it is equally true that that method, applied to the improvements of our rivers and harbors, has proved a dismal failure. It has proved a failure simply because the river and harbor bill has not usually been sustained by public opinion outside of this House, and I move this amendment because I believe that if the method proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] were adopted, we could well afford to appropriate a much larger sum than the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has ventured for some time to propose. We all admit that ten or fifteen millions of dollars could be well expended on rivers and harbors in this country, yet the committee propose an expenditure of only seven and a half millions. Why is it that they propose so small a sum? It is, I think, because they feel that outside of this House there is a prejudice against the river and harbor bill. I do not say that that prejudice is deserved; I do not say that there are "jobs" in the usual river and harbor bill; but I do say that it is easy to make that charge outside of this House, and that therefore the Committee on Rivers and Harbors do not venture to propose so large a sum as they would venture to propose, and as the people would approve if it were seen that the control of the expenditure of the money was in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HAMMOND. The Democratic Secretary.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I do not care what the politics of the Secretary may be. The proposition that this expenditure is under the control of the local engineers, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], is a mistake. The manner of the expenditure at each particular place may be under the control of the local engineer; but how can the local engineers be said to have the task of distributing among the different localities the total that is appropriated by the bill?

Mr. BAYNE. For this reason: The Secretary of War derives his entire information from the local engineers, and the expenditures are made according to the reports which the local engineers make to the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But the Secretary of War now derives all his authority from the river and harbor bill. This river and harbor bill appropriates only seven million and a half dollars, although the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would acknowledge, I think, that ten or twelve millions of dollars might well be expended. There is the fact that stares us in the face. On the other hand, I believe that public sentiment would support and sanction the method proposed by the gentleman from Kansas. I believe that in this way we should succeed in getting a larger amount of money spent upon legitimate enterprises of river and harbor improvements. That is the reason I have addressed my remarks to this particular amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then the virtue of the gentleman's plan is in getting more money out of the Treasury?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. One defect of the present plan is that we get only 25 per cent. as much as the engineers say can be advantageously expended.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am fully convinced that there is merit in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be afraid of the concentration of power in the hands of the Secretary of War. The great difficulty, Mr. Chairman, with the river and harbor bill is because of the dispersion of responsibility on the part of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I do not believe there is a member of that committee who gives his approval to all the various appropriations carried by this bill. Some of these appropriations—indeed many of them—doubtless meet the approval of the chairman of the committee, for example; yet I am satisfied there are others to which he would not give his indorsement. So it is with the other members of the committee. There are fifteen of them. They divide the responsibility as a committee, and then the responsibility is still further divided with the majority of this House.

The gain to be had by the adoption of this amendment is to charge one man with the responsibility of selecting those works which are worthy of improvement, and then making the improvement in the best and most practical manner. Under existing circumstances there is no responsibility resting upon anybody; and therefore it is possible to have year after year a river and harbor bill appropriating millions of dollars which might just as well be thrown away, and which, in fact, are thrown away.

If we had the system now proposed, if there were an officer charged with the responsibility in the full view of the whole people of the country and subject to the criticism of the press, he would be chary of making expenditures upon the little insignificant creeks and the minor harbors which play no part whatever in the commerce of this country. He would see to it that only those great works which concern the commercial intercourse of the people should be the recipients of the public expenditure.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose that under this amendment, if adopted, the Secretary of War should see fit to expend the whole of the money on the Mississippi River?

Mr. HEPBURN. He would be responsible to the people of this country for doing so; and if he made an erroneous selection of the work he would find that the administration with which he is connected would experience a practical expression of the disapproval of the people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How would that help the people after the money had all gone?

Mr. HEPBURN. It might not help them in that particular instance, but it would enable us to avoid this annual extravagance which each Congress at each session falls into.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How could the people get at the Secretary of War if he should make a mistake or do wrong?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, if the gentleman does not know that, five minutes will not give me sufficient time to explain it to him.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No; and an hour would not suffice.

Mr. HEPBURN. Probably not; it depends upon the organization of the individual. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. The individual making the explanation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope we shall now have a vote.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out lines 3 to 8, and insert—

"That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which may be expended by the Secretary of War as he shall deem necessary, either for the repair, preservation, construction, or completion of such public works on rivers and harbors as shall, in his judgment, afford practical and important facilities for the transportation, by water, of interstate commerce."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 11, noes 51.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not consume time by insisting upon a quorum. We have allowed the fullest debate on this proposition.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 12, noes 151.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, when a message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 8923) to amend an act in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 3128) concerning post-offices of the third class, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to modify the amendment by inserting the words "or foreign," so as to read, "interstate or foreign commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that modification will be made.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman will give State commerce a chance. Is he not willing to do anything for commerce which remains within a State?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas object to the request of the gentleman from Kansas to modify his amendment?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, as modified, there were—ayes 14, noes 89.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make the point of no quorum, for the purpose of asking my friend from Kentucky if he will allow a yea and nay vote upon this amendment in the House.

Mr. WILLIS. With the understanding that the gentleman shall cease obstructive proceedings and let the consideration of the bill go on, I will consent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am really surprised at the gentleman's remark. I simply asked him to allow a vote to be taken on this question in the House. I certainly reserve the right to act as I may deem best on any other portion of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman can secure in the House enough members to order the yeas and nays, I will allow the question to come up.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is, you will allow me to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. Allow you to call the yeas and nays; and if you can get enough members to support you, you will have them.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Well, I will take the chances.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of "no quorum" not being insisted upon, the noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to offer another amendment, which I think will be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. After the word "expended" insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary." The bill as it now reads would seem to make it peremptory—mandatory upon the Secretary of War to expend each of these sums contained in the bill. The language is:

The following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

My amendment would be that it be paid "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended or so much thereof as may be necessary." In other words, not to make it mandatory upon the Secretary of War to expend the money which he may not find it necessary should be expended.

Mr. WILLIS. The language of the bill is the language of all the river and harbor bills passed in the last ten years. The words "to be expended" are simply directory of the method of expenditure. They are not at all mandatory in any sense. They are to be expended. How? Under the Secretary of War. I hope, therefore, in the interest of the uniform text of the bill for a quarter of a century, my friend will not press his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me add to what I have already stated, that the Secretary of War under the law has the discretion to withhold any amount appropriated in this bill, if any good or sufficient reason shall be presented why he should do so. It is under his direction.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I understand my friend from Kentucky to say that similar language has heretofore been used, and it has not been held to be mandatory.

Mr. WILLIS. That is so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I do not insist upon my amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have an amendment to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "names," in line 8—
"Provided, Such expenditure shall be without the intervention of either the Mississippi or Missouri River Commission."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the other day in the discussion of this bill gentlemen on the other side criticised a statement I made in regard to revetment work in the improvement of the Mississippi River at Plumb Point and Lake Providence Reaches. I made the statement that improvement, as shown, cost $42 a linear foot. Two gentlemen challenged the correctness of that statement.

I founded that statement on a report that had been made, and I am not now able to lay my hand upon it; but I have here another report, made in 1884, giving estimates for the Plumb Point Reach. I find in these estimates for revetment work $12 a linear foot is the lowest sum that is given, and that for the dikes the estimates range from $12.25 to $34.50 a linear foot.

I find, further, in a report signed by General Comstock, this language:

Not concurring in either the recommendation or estimate, it is proper to give my reasons for dissenting. The original estimate of the commission for 38 miles of Plumb Point Reach was $1,432,000, and for 25 miles of Lake Providence Reach $1,238,000. It is now certain the cost of these works will not be less than three times the original estimate, and even yet it is not practicable to state with definiteness what the ultimate cost will be.

Here is the authority of one of the members of the commission that the cost of revetment work will exceed $36 a linear foot, and that the cost of the channel improvement will range from three times $12.75 to three times $34.50.

I think this is sufficient to sustain the statement I made the other day. I will try to furnish the statement, however, to which I have referred before we get through, if this bill shall occupy as much time as I hope it will.

The question was put to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 52.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum has voted.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WILLIS and Mr. HEPBURN.

The committee again proceeded to divide.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, is it not in order to have a call of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires the Chair to order a call of the committee when it finds itself without a quorum. The tellers have not yet reported the total vote.

Mr. DUNN. I hope there will be a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other gentleman desires to vote the tellers will report.

The tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 145.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule it is the duty of the Chair, the point being made that a quorum is not present, to order the roll to be called.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Adams, J. J.	Cooper,	Kelley,	Ryan,
Aiken,	Cox, S. S.	Ketcham,	Scott,
Allen, C. H.	Cox, W. R.	Kleiner,	Seney,

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the river and harbor bill, had found itself without a quorum, whereupon he had directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees.

Mr. HALL. I understand that my colleague, Mr. MURPHY, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MCRAE. My colleague, Mr. ROGERS, is absent from the House to-day because of sickness.

Mr. GIBSON, of Maryland. My colleague, Mr. COMPTON, is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. WADE, is absent, sick.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees, under the rule, will be entered on the Journal. From the roll-call it appears there are present 211 members, and 107 absent. Being more than a quorum, the committee will resume its sitting.

The Committtee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to insure accuracy in the count, the Chair thinks that the division should be taken over again.

The tellers having resumed their places the committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 7, noes 157.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "Secretary of War," in the sixth line, and insert the word "President."

I will only occupy the time of the House, as it is anxious to proceed with the work on this bill, to say just this much: It seems there should be vested in the President, and directly, this power, inasmuch as the engineers who have charge of the work hold their commissions directly from him, and are designated by him to receive these commissions. It is apparent to me that this would tend to a closer relationship. This the amendment seeks to accomplish, and perhaps there would be a better discharge of the duties on the part of the engineers if the amendment should become law.

Mr. HEPBURN. The adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin places power with responsibility. The President of the United States has the power to designate the officers that may conduct this work. He may do that in opposition to the preferences of the Secretary. He may put the power to direct the work in the hands of persons that, to the Secretary, may seem a very unwise selection, and yet the Secretary is charged with the proper expenditure of the money. Therefore it seems to me there is much of merit in the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, it was only a little while ago that an amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Iowa himself, was rejected, which placed these expenditures altogether in the hands of the Secretary of War, because the Secretary of War was responsible; and he saw some way, as he said, although he has not had his hour and five minutes to explain it, by which the people could get at the Secretary of War and make him suffer if he did not properly exercise that power. Then the gentleman would have gladly voted to confer the power upon him. Now the gentleman, not having succeeded in placing the whole matter in the hands of the Secretary of War, discovers that he is not properly responsible, and he wants to place the whole matter under still higher authority—that is, in the hands of the President of the United States. I shall look with a great deal of curiosity to see where the gentleman would next place the power, after the failure to deposit it in the hands of the President.

Mr. HEPBURN. With the usual inaccuracy of the gentleman from Maine he has succeeded in entirely misstating the proposition I advocated a little while ago.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I doubt if the gentleman can state it accurately himself.

Mr. HEPBURN. I stated that I was in favor of and voted for a proposition to take away from the Mississippi and Missouri River Commissions all instrumentality whatever in the distribution of this money. I felt it was infinitely better it should be in the hands of the Secretary than in the hands of the commissioners. That is all I said here by voice or vote of mine in that matter.

Mr. MILLIKEN. But was the gentleman not, at that time, desirous of having it in the hands of the Secretary?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman's position then does not seem consistent with his position now.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think there is an appearance of inconsistency to any member of the House except the gentleman from Maine. I desire to have the power put in even more responsible hands than those of the Secretary. It were better that the money should be expended by the Secretary than by the Mississippi River Commission, but much better that it should be expended by the President than by the Secretary. Is there any inconsistency in these two propositions?

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Iowa does not seem to recognize with his usual acuteness the fact that in the remarks he made a short time ago he expressed himself as being entirely satisfied to place this expenditure in the hands of the Secretary of War. Perhaps he may be accurate enough to restate his own statement and reiterate his own argument without making it an exactly different thing from what he said an hour ago.

Mr. HEPBURN. Just as I stated, I am entirely satisfied to have it in the hands of the Secretary rather than in the hands of the commission. I am very much better satisfied to have it in the hands of the President than to have it in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not believe this is a wise amendment to make. The Secretary of War has, I think, more time than the President to discharge his duties. He has not got a very ponderous Army to look after. The duties of looking after our present Army are not very onerous; whereas the duties of the President of the United States, I think, are heavy enough now. He has a load upon his shoulders which is more than any one man can carry; and that is in carrying civil-service reform to a successful issue. [Laughter.] And I do think, Mr. Chairman, that to add the improvements and varied expenditures under the river and harbor bill, with all its creeks and revetments, to the duty of carrying out civil-service reform within the rules which he has already laid down, and so as to please the Democracy and the mugwumps, would be piling entirely too much on the Executive; and, for one, I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire very briefly to call the attention of the committee to the condition of this bill. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, created by the action of this House, and charged with the responsibility of examining the reports of the various engineers of the country, have been laboriously at work—a large number of them during the holiday recess—endeavoring to the best of their ability to perfect a bill to bring before this House.

I need not remind gentlemen on this floor of the custom which years ago prevailed in the passage of river and harbor bills. It is a well-known fact that until the present Committee on Rivers and Harbors was created all of these bills were passed under a suspension of the rules, no opportunity being afforded for criticism, and no opportunity for amendment. There was, therefore, properly very grave objection on the part of many members of the House to that method of dealing with this subject. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, recognizing the force of that objection, have, with reference to all bills which they have brought before this and the last Congress, determined to bring them into the House for amendment and for criticism, desiring only to put in the bill that which is right, and equally anxious with any gentleman present on this floor to put out of the bill anything that was wrong.

Under these circumstances we bring this bill before the Committee of the Whole. Is it the desire of gentlemen who oppose this bill to compel this committee, as a matter of necessity, to go back to the old system of suspending the rules and passing this bill? If so, I submit to them, in all candor and all kindness, that the very object they have in view, of striking out certain portions of the bill and amending others, will be forever lost to them. I appeal to them in the interest of the very object they have in view, of correcting any faults there may be in the bill, to allow us, in the usual and ordinary way, to take up these appropriations one by one, and if a majority of this House thinks any line or portion of the bill is wrong, let us strike it out as we do in other bills, and perfect the bill in Committee of the Whole and present it in the House. In the interest of the public, in the interest of these great water-ways, in the interest of these great harbors that demand annual instead of biennial appropriations, I appeal to all the members of this House to enable us to pass this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am glad to hear the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the last word. I say I am glad that the gentleman has declared his purpose so plainly, even if the declaration is coupled with the threat which he so mildly puts forth. The gentleman says, in substance, that if members of this House choose to exercise their rights under the rules of the House, rights that are guaranteed to them by the majority here, ay, that are forced upon them by the majority—that if they choose to exercise those rights, he proposes to cut off all debate and all possibility of perfecting this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. HEPBURN. I submit to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] that no amendment has been proposed to this bill which would not, in the judgment of certain members of the House, improve it; and, in seeking to make that improvement, those members but exercised rights which belonged to them as clearly and as indisputably as any rights that he possesses as a member of the House belong to him. Gentlemen may complain that there have been dilatory motions made in the effort to secure a quorum, but, Mr. Chairman, this bill carries seven and a half millions of dollars, and ought there not to be a quorum when such a bill is being considered? Is it proposed that a bill appropriating more than twice the sum of all the appropriation bills that were passed at any session of Congress during the first ten years of the life of the nation shall go through in bulk by the votes of a mere fragment of the House?

I suggest to the gentleman that where there is a sum of money so large as this, where there are expenditures so open to criticism, where there is a proposition to pass a bill that could not pass by two-thirds, or by any other number, if it was not for the joining of interests and the "pooling of issues"—I suggest to my friend that in such a case we have a right to secure all the deliberation, and all the time we require for deliberation, by the use of the rules of this House, and to challenge the attention of the country, as we can do only in that way, to the manner in which the bill is made up, to the joining of interests and the securing of the assent of members by appeals to them in the direction of their personal and local interests, and, further than that, to show the character of the rules of the House. If this exercise of power upon the part of certain members under the rules is not a proper exercise, why are not the rules changed? Why is it that the gentleman will vote for them when they subserve his purposes, and yet condemn them when they fail to do so? I am anxious, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should be defeated. I believe it ought to be defeated, and I believe that there ought to be a thorough consideration of all its parts, because I think that if such consideration could be had, and if there could be eliminated the personal interests that are involved by reason of localities, the bill would be defeated. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. LA FOLLETTE; and there were—ayes 13, noes 120.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of "no quorum" being made, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to act as tellers.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RICHARDSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10419) known as the river and harbor bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. WILLIS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce that Hon. CHARLES B. FARWELL, Senator-elect from the State of Illinois, is present and ready to take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect will please come forward and the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. FARWELL, escorted by Mr. CULLOM, advanced to the desk of the President pro tempore, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him he took his seat in the Senate.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FRYE presented the credentials of EUGENE HALE, chosen by the Legislature of Maine as Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1887; which were read and ordered to be filed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a report from the Court of Claims of their findings of fact and conclusions of law in the cases of claims on account of spoliations by the French considered by that court under the provisions of the act of January 30, 1885. If there be no objection the communication will be printed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there not a letter of transmittal?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is quite a long document. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. It is proper to have the report referred to the Committee on Claims. I thought there might be a short letter of transmittal which would indicate more fully the subject-matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no letter accompanying the report, but simply the caption which the Chair has stated.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, in compliance with a resolution of January 17, 1887, a statement showing the value of miscellaneous supplies furnished the several bureaus of that Department during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, charged to the contingent appropriation for the Department for that year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2981) to abrogate the powers of the executive officers of the United States in allowing indemnity locations or scrip for confirmed, unsatisfied private land claims, under section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 11, pages 294 and 295, chapter 81), and to vest that power in the courts of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted by the American Berkshire Association favoring the passage of the agricultural experiment-station bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kansas in regard to a matter of very great importance, to wit, the method of disposing of lands for sale under the judgments rendered by the Federal courts. I ask that it may be read at length and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I desire to especially call the attention of that committee to it in connection with the bill which has recently passed the other House on the general subject of the jurisdiction of the Federal judiciary, which is now pending before that committee.

The memorial was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

[House concurrent resolution No. 10. By Mr. Bond.]

Whereas under the existing system and laws of civil procedure in the Federal courts of the United States the real estate of judgment debtors is allowed to be advertised for sale and sold at places remote from the county wherein situated; and

Whereas by the means of such system and laws a judgment debtor is often rendered powerless to save his home or lands from being bought in by judgment creditors or speculators, at prices that are ruinous to the debtor, by reason of the fact that those acquainted with such home or lands, and who know their true value and might be disposed to buy the same, have no knowledge of an advertisement for sale of such home or lands, and for the further reason that the distance to the place of sale prevents their presence at such sale, even when such proposed sale is known to them; and

Whereas thousands of such judgment debtors are too poor to defend suits in the Federal courts, and, much more, to procure the attendance of bidders able to protect their interests at such a sale so made, remote from the location of the home or lands, and are thus made liable to be seriously impoverished and injured, when by just procedure and rightful privileges much of the value of their homes and lands might be saved to them in money: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein),

First. That the statutes of the United States should be so amended as to require that all lands to be sold under process from a Federal court be advertised for sale in the county where such land is situated, and that the sale thereof shall take place at the door of the court-house in such county in pursuance of such advertisement of a sale.

Second. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed that it is the wish of the people of Kansas that they severally use their utmost endeavors to so cause the statutes of the United States to be amended as to carry out the objects herein stated

Third. That a printed copy hereof be at once sent by the secretary of state to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Kansas.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of Secretary of State:

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the house concurrent resolution now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal.

Done at Topeka, Kans., this 21st day of January, A. D. 1887.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition signed by the executive committee of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars of the State of Kansas, on behalf of a membership of three thousand, petitioning for the favorable consideration and early passage of the bill (S. 1579) granting to the people of the District of Columbia the right to determine by ballot whether intoxicating liquors may hereafter be legally manufactured and sold in said District or not.

I desire to say in regard to the petition that I am in favor of conferring upon the persons of proper age in the District of Columbia the right of suffrage for municipal purposes, and of making the city of Washington the best possible illustration of the republican idea of self-government. I believe it would conduce to the comfort of Congress, to the welfare of the people of the District, and, as I think, to the glory of republican institutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of David S. Moody, a citizen of the State of Vermont, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAHONE presented the petiton of John F. Lewis, of Lynnwood, Va.; which was read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

LYNNWOOD, VA., January 19, 1887.

To the Senate of the United States:

I respectfully ask that my salary be paid from the commencement of my term to the time that it was paid, and your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

JOHN F. LEWIS.

Mr. COKE. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas. I ask that it be read, referring as it does to a bill pending in this body.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

House concurrent resolution relating to the right of way through the Indian Territory for the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company.

Whereas the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company is now constructing a railway across the State of Kansas to Caldwell, near the south line of said State, which point will be reached about June 1, 1887, and proposes to extend said line of railway across the Indian Territory, into the State of Texas, and across said State in several directions, and desire to push the construction of said lines as rapidly as possible; and

Whereas said company now have a bill pending in the United States Congress granting right of way across said Indian Territory, which said company desires to have amended so as to authorize the branching of said line in said Indian Territory so as to reach the State of Texas by the different routes desired; and

Whereas said company intends to begin the construction across said Indian Territory about April 1, 1887: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress be requested and our Senators instructed to use all honorable means to secure the passage of the bill granting said Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company the right of way across said Indian Territory by this the Forty-ninth Congress, and at as early a day as possible.

Be it further resolved, That the chief clerk of the house of representatives be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution.

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Austin, Tex., January 18, 1887.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing concurrent resolution originated in the house and passed the same January 17, 1887; and, further, that the same was returned from the senate, as passed, January 18, 1887.

WILL LAMBERT,
Chief clerk house of representatives.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of George W. Stearns and others, citizens of Hadley, Mass., praying for the enactment of an international arbitration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER presented resolutions adopted by Maxson Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Alfred Center, N. Y., urging the passage of the Edmunds-Tucker bill for the suppression of polygamy; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH presented the petition of the Rumford Chemical Works, of Providence, R. I.; the petition of Clarence J. Luce and other citizens of Providence, R. I.; and the petition of W. B. Blanding and other wholesale druggists of Providence, R. I., praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of the interstate-commerce bill, and instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the passage of the bill.

I also present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota of the same general character, although somewhat different in form, and a telegraphic communication from the secretary of state of Minnesota, advising the Senators of the passage of these resolutions in accordance with one of the resolves embraced in the joint resolution presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be printed in the RECORD and ordered to lie on the table.

The resolutions are as follows:

A joint resolution urging upon Congress the passage of the pending bill for the regulation of interstate commerce.

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill to establish a system of national regulation and supervision of the interstate commerce of the country, and for the control of railroad corporations doing business in two or more States on continuous lines: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

That we respectfully urge upon Congress the passage of said bill, and we instruct our Senators and request our Representatives to vote for the same.

The people of Minnesota can not understand why there should not be the same competition between railway corporations as exists between all other forms of business enterprise. The people, having created the railroads by grants of corporate privileges and largesses of lands or money, are entitled to all the benefits justly derivable from the same. And all combinations, by pooling of business or earnings to prevent competition, simply mean high rates of profit to the holders of railroad stock at the expense of low rates of earnings to the people. It is the duty of Congress to so act as to insure the general prosperity of the many, for therein will be found the best guarantee for the success of the few. The prosperity of the people is a national necessity; the continued existence of railway companies, based largely on fictitious and fraudulent capital, is not. Even should some of these companies be driven to the wall under the pressure of unlimited competition, the railroads themselves will still remain, and they would, in all probability earn a reasonable interest on the money actually invested in their construction. But if they did not, they would have no more to complain of than thousands of manufacturing, commercial, agricultural, and mining enterprises which have utterly failed under the fierce ordeal of competition. Railroad companies have no more right to ask that the Government shall make them profitable at the expense of the people than the owner of a mill, a shop, a farm, or a mine would have to make the same demand. Unrestricted competition is the great force to which all men and interests in the world have to submit, and we see no reason why the common carriers of this country should, by the action or non-action of Government, be permitted to make themselves an exception to the universal law.

The people of Minnesota do not ask that on long lines of railway the rate of charge for transportation of property shall be the same per mile for every mile hauled; but we do ask that the aggregate charge for a short distance shall not be greater than the aggregate charge for a longer distance in the same direction. In other words, while we do not demand that the charge for 10 miles shall be one-tenth of the charge for 100 miles, we do object to making the charge for 10 miles greater than the charge for 100 miles. Neither do we ask that Congress, or the commission to be appointed under the act of Congress, shall fix minimum rates below which charges shall not fall, but maximum rates above which they shall not rise. We respectfully urge that nothing shall be done by Congress that will lessen or limit the commercial facilities of the intercontinental portions of the nation. It is their right to reach the seacoast and the external world by the cheapest and best instrumentalities that civilization can give them.

Resolved, That the secretary of state telegraph the substance of these resolutions to our Senators, and forward a copy of the resolutions themselves to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress; "and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be further specially urged and instructed to favor an amendment to said bill, as in their judgment, to endeavor to procure an enactment: Provided, further, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation per ton per mile for the transportation of like kind or class of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a longer than a shorter distance over the same line in the same general direction, or from the same original point of departure, or to the same point of arrival, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great a rate of compensation per ton per mile for the longer as for the shorter distance."

WILLIAM R. MERRIAM,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
A. E. RICE,
President of the Senate.

Approved January 18, A. D. 1887.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Department of State:

I hereby certify that I have carefully compared the foregoing with the original now on file in this department, and that it is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of the same.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 20th day of January, A. D. 1887.

[SEAL.] H. MATTSON, Secretary of state.

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to give their support to a pending bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers.

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Whereas section 4 of Article X of the constitutio of the State of Minnesota provides that all corporations being common carriers, enjoying the right of way in pursuance of the provisions of this section, shall be bound to carry the mineral, agricultural, and other productions of manufactures on equal and reasonable terms; and

Whereas many of the railroad corporations, chartered and endowed with munificent grants and valuable franchises, rights, and privileges by this State, have, by their extension through growth and consolidation, become interstate common carriers, and as such claim freedom from State jurisdiction and regulation; and

Whereas all attempts at State regulation designed to protect the people of the State from such common misuse of railroad corporate power as rebates, pooling, and unequal and unreasonable traffic charges have heretofore proved insufficient by reason of the position of these corporations as being mediums of interstate commerce, as claimed by them; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate branch of the Congress of the United States a bill for regulation of interstate commerce, the application of the principles of which to the regulation of the common carriers of this State would be of great advantage to the agricultural, manufacturing, and mercantile interests of our State; and

Whereas said pending bill does not, but should, in our judgment, include a provision making it unlawful for any common carrier carrying freight from one State into another to charge a higher rate per ton per mile for a longer than for a shorter continuous haul; and

Whereas this conceded correct principle of traffic is constantly violated by the common carriers of this State and of the country, and its violation made a means to enforce unjust discrimination against and in favor of cities and towns of the State and country: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to give their active and earnest support to the pending interstate-commerce bill, and to introduce and support an amendment thereto as above indicated.

Resolved, That a copy of the above preamble and resolutions be sent by the governor of the State to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to our State agent.

A. E. RICE,
President of the senate.
WILLIAM R. MERRIAM,
Speaker of the house of representatives.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Department of state:

I hereby certify that I have carefully compared the foregoing with the original now on file in this department, and that it is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of the same.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 21st day of January, A. D. 1887.

[SEAL.] H. MATTSON, Secretary of state.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petition of William W. Marmon and 6 other druggists of Bloomington, Ill., praying for a reduction of internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Orvin R. McDaniel, of Shumway, Ill., praying that he be granted an honorable discharge from the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois; which was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

Joint resolution adopted by the thirty-fifth General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

Whereas the existence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia among cattle in the United States is the result of negligence upon the part of the Federal Government in failing to enact and enforce proper quarantine measures on the seaboard; and

Whereas the various States and Territories of the Union have, for their own protection, been compelled to resort to embarrassing quarantine regulations, thereby seriously obstructing interstate commerce; and

Whereas this disease has, during the past two years, made rapid progress in spite of the utmost endeavor of State authorities: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring therein), That we do hereby urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of the bill now pending in the United States Senate for the suppression of exotic contagious diseases among cattle, to the end that one of our greatest business industries may be relieved from an impending calamity, that the meat supply of the nation may be saved from losses which would directly affect every consumer of meat, and that the foreign stigma now attached to one of our principal articles of export may be removed.

Resolved, That the vigorous measures proposed in the Miller bill should be made to apply only to diseases of foreign origin, and not to common diseases to which the cattle of the United States are subject, and which are only equivalent to the ordinary dangers to which other branches of business are subjected.

Adopted by the senate January 12, 1887.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, Office of Secretary, ss:

I, Henry D. Dement, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution adopted by the thirty-fifth General Assembly of the State of Illinois, and now on file in this office.

In witness whereof I hereto set my hand and affix the great seal of State, at the city of Springfield, this —— day of ——, 188—.

[SEAL.] HENRY D. DEMENT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS. I present resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of the citizens of the District of Columbia in favor of the construction of a bridge at the eastern terminus of Pennsylvania avenue across the East Branch. The bill having been reported favorably by the committee, I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented resolutions adopted by Leavenworth Post, No. 120, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; George Ellis Post, No. 171, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; Hackleman Post, No. 258, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; Lookout Post, No. 96, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; E. C. Johnson Post, No. 336, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; and James Montgomery Post, No. 154, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, all favoring action upon the anti-polygamy bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of wholesale druggists of Pittsburgh and Allegheny cities, Pa., and a petition of citizens of Caln Township, Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of citizens of Portland, Me., praying that internal taxation be reduced as rapidly as the condition of the Treasury will allow; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GIBSON. I present a memorial of the officers and members of the Louisiana State Ministerial Association, composed of colored people, in favor of the amelioration of the condition of the people religiously, socially, and educationally, and especially in favor of the Blair bill aiding the States in the establishment of public schools. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. I also present a memorial adopted at a meeting of steamboatmen held in the city of New Orleans on November 11, 1886, in favor of the more rapid improvement of the Red, Ouachita, and Atchafalaya Rivers and the Bayou Teche. It is signed by R. Sinnott, chairman, A. P. Trousdale, T. C. Sweeney, W. H. Belt, and J. W. Bryant, who constitute the committee on resolutions. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit a report from the conference committee on the army appropriation bill, and ask that it may be disposed of at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 18, and 30.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, and 31, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert before the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment the words "not exceeding;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert before the word proposed to be inserted by said amendment the words "not exceeding;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$12,661,918.69;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$9,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from said amendment the word "ordnance" where it first occurs, and strike out the sum named in the last line of the amended paragraph and insert in lieu thereof "$80,000," and the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

EDWARD S. BRAGG,
EGBERT L. VIELE,
GEO. W. STEELE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the Senator to explain the leading topics of this report, as it is impossible, of course, by the mere numbers of the amendments to understand the decision of the conferees.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Vermont that many of these amendments are formal; indeed I may say all of them with the exception, perhaps, of amendment number 26, which is an amendment of some importance relating to the administration of the Army. The Senate struck out that proviso in the bill, and the House conferees have agreed that it shall be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator just state what the proviso was in the bill? I have it not before me.

Mr. ALLISON. The proviso required that no expenditure should be made for removing troops until the authority of the Quartermaster-General was first procured. That is substantially the proviso. The Senate struck that out, and the House conferees agree to the Senate amendment. It was as we construed it, substantially placing the control of the Army under the Quartermaster-General instead of the General-in-Chief.

The Senate recede from amendments numbered 17 and 18, number 17 being an amendment providing the General of the Army with a clerk. It was insisted upon by the House conferees that this should be provided for in the legislative appropriation bill where the civil force of the Army is provided for, and it was thought that some clerk should be detailed, rather than provided for in this bill, which is a bill for the support of the Army.

The Senate also inserted an amendment providing additional pay to the officer commanding the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, $1,000, which the House conferees refused to agree to and the Senate conferees recede.

The other amendments are amendments changing amounts and generally reducing amounts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the total amount of the appropriation now?

Mr. ALLISON. The total amount of the appropriation as provided for in the bill, if the report of the committee of conference is agreed to, is $23,724,718.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much was it last year?

Mr. ALLISON. It was last year $28,338.52 more. This is a reduction from the bill of last year of $28,338.52 and is less than the estimates, $1,799,000, in round numbers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is that reduction made—in general?

Mr. ALLISON. The most of this reduction of twenty-eight thousand and odd dollars is in a single item, which is an item relating to the incidental expenses of the Ordance Department. Of course there are some miscellaneous changes, increases and reductions, but as a rule the appropriations for the maintenance of the Army are substantially as made last year for quartermaster and commissary supplies, and the pay of the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The principal reduction is in incidental expenses of the Ordnance Department?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which means experimental work on guns, I suppose?

Mr. ALLISON. No; it does not curtail the amount necessary to be expended for that purpose. It relates chiefly to the appropriation which has hitherto been used largely for clerical force.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know any more favorable opportunity to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what has become of the fortification appropriation bill of last season, providing for the wants of the current fiscal year. It was reported some months ago as having gone into conference; indeed, I am credibly informed it did so go. But the year is fast passing. If anything is to be done with that bill we should be glad to know it, I am sure; and if there is not to be anything reported or done, it is time that we should be pressing for some action in the direction of coastwise defenses.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut that at the close of the last session, as he will remember, the Senate amended the fortification appropriation bill and returned it to the other House and a conference was ordered upon it. The conferees were unable to agree. I believe my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is chairman of the conference committee. I understand that they have made special efforts at this session to come to an agreement and finally made some effort to secure a meeting, which I believe has failed from time to time. The Senator from Massachusetts can explain that more in detail, and I hope he will.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

Mr. DAWES. The committee of conference held two or three meetings during the first session of this Congress and were unable to agree. They made report to their respective Houses, and their reports were accepted and a new committee appointed, which held meetings with the same result and made the same report. A new committee was appointed at the close of the last session. Immediately upon the assembling of this session the committee were called together and have had several meetings without being able as yet to agree.

Whether it is proper to state what difficulties are found to exist in the committee of conference I am not certain. I have no objection to stating what the difficulties are, if it is a proper matter for disclosure here. There is some prospect that in some shape there may be an early agreement.

The conferences have been interrupted by the absence of two of the members of the committee of conference on the part of the House, one of them having been called home to Alabama by telegraph on account of sickness in his family. As soon as the conferees can be got together again it is the intention of the committee to make further effort, with what result no one can tell.

The difficulties seem to be radical. The difference in the conference committee is between doing substantially nothing and appropriating $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to begin the work of coast defenses. No one can need in this body to have his attention called to the necessity and importance of beginning that work. There seems to be a lack of confidence on the part of some of the members of the committee in those who would execute the law under existing administration.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is not referring to the Senate members of the conference, I suppose?

Mr. DAWES. I am not referring to any member of the conference committee on the part of the Senate. I think if the committee of conference could be induced to establish a new bureau for the purpose of executing the law a good deal of the difficulty could be got over. Whether they will be able to agree to that and report to their two Houses for sanction I am not quite able to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the report of the committee of conference, submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

The report was concurred in.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report, which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the said amendment of the House, and insert in lieu thereof the following, namely:

"That in all cases where any tribe or band of Indians has been, or shall hereafter be, located upon any reservation created for their use, either by treaty stipulation or by virtue of an act of Congress or executive order setting apart the same for their use, the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation or any part thereof of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes, to cause said reservation, or any part thereof, to be surveyed, or resurveyed if necessary, and to allot the lands in said reservation in severalty to any Indian located thereon, in quantities as follows:

"To each head of a family, one-quarter of a section;

"To each single person over eighteen years of age, one-eighth of a section;

"To each orphan child under eighteen years of age, one-eighth of a section; and

"To each other single person under eighteen years now living, or who may be born prior to the date of the order of the President directing an allotment of the lands embraced in any reservation, one-sixteenth of a section: Provided, That in case there is not sufficient land in any of said reservations to allot lands to each individual of the classes above named in quantities as above provided, the lands embraced in such reservation or reservations shall be allotted to each individual of each of said classes pro rata in accordance with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That where the treaty or act of Congress setting apart such reservation provides for the allotment of lands in severalty in quantities in excess of those herein provided, the President, in making allotments upon such reservation, shall allot the lands to each individual Indian belonging thereon in quantity as specified in such treaty or act: And provided further, That when the lands allotted are only valuable for grazing purposes, an additional allotment of such grazing lands, in quantities as above provided, shall be made to each individual."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Strike out the word "two" in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "four;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Insert after the word "may" and before the word "in" in said amendment, the words "in any case;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Add to said amendment the following words:

"And provided further, That no patents shall issue therefor except to the person so taking the same as and for a homestead, or his heirs, and after the expiration of five years' occupancy thereof as such homestead; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, or lien thereon, created prior to the date of such patent, shall be null and void."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Insert in place of the words to be stricken out by said amendment, the following words:

"And the sums agreed to be paid by the United States as purchase-money for any portion of any such reservation shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use of the tribe or tribes of Indians to whom such reservations belonged, and the same, with interest thereon at 3 per cent. per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of such tribe or tribes of Indians or the members thereof."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment, and insert instead thereof the following:

"SEC. 11. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from their present reservations in Southwestern Colorado to a new reservation by and with the consent of a majority of the adult male members of said tribe."

And that the House agree to the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. DOLPH. I have not been able to follow the conference report so as to ascertain what changes have been made in the bill. It is a very important bill, affecting the future relations of the Government to the Indians and the future welfare of the Indians. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee of conference a question or two so as to know if I am correct. Do I understand that the changes made by the House amendments and the conference committee permit a lien or disposition of lands that shall be allotted to Indians in severalty after the lapse of a less period than that provided in the bill as passed by the Senate—twenty-five years? Also, do I understand that the provision inserted in the bill in the Senate——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator put his first interrogatory again?

Mr. DOLPH. My question is whether such changes have been made in the bill that instead of the bill as it passed the Senate providing that the land which shall be allotted to Indians in severalty can only be disposed of or be subject to liens after a period of twenty-five years, it now allows that to be done after five years?

Mr. DAWES. No; that has not been changed, except in this way, that the President may, in his discretion in any particular case, extend the time after the twenty-five years. The time limiting the power of alienation is not reduced at all, but has this further extension in the discretion of the President as to any particular case.

Mr. DOLPH. According to the conference report, when are patents to issue to the individual Indians?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will get the bill he will see. As soon as the individual Indian takes up his allotment he is to have a patent which shall be of the legal effect that the United States holds in trust this particular tract of land for the sole use and benefit of the particular Indian for the period of twenty-five years, at the end of which time the United States is to give him a patent in fee of the land; and then to that is added a provision that in any particular case the President may extend that twenty-five years' limit so that the United States shall in that particular case hold the land in trust for the Indian a further time.

Mr. DOLPH. I am familiar with the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate, but the first amendment read at the desk seemed to be a long one, providing for the allotment of the lands and also a new provision in regard to the issuance of patents. Of course I have had no opportunity to examine the report.

Mr. DAWES. The other House rewrote the clause which that amendment superseded, and it was thought in confidence that it was not improved by their rewriting; and so they have receded from their phraseology and have agreed to restore the original text of that section almost entirely. It was necessary, however, in putting it into the report to put in the new form in which it was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator another question. When the bill was under discussion I proposed an amendment to the effect that the proceeds of the lands which should be sold should be placed in the Treasury of the United States at interest, that the interest might be used at any time for educational or other purposes for the benefit of the Indians, but that the principal should not be subject to be diminished until the expiration of twenty-five years. That was recommended to me by General Sheridan and by others who are familiar with the Indian question. The argument was that by the bill we proposed to break up the reservations and take the means which the Government now has for taking care of these Indians and dispose of them, distribute the lands, sell the surplus, place the money in the Treasury, and that the principal of the proceeds of the lands sold was to be used in the mean time before the expiration of the twenty-five years for the benefit of the Indians, and at the end of the twenty-five years, if the policy now being pursued by the Government is changed, instead of the Indians being self-sustaining and self-supporting we should have a large number of paupers on our hands without anything but the money in the Treasury derived from taxation to support them. I understand, if I have correctly heard the reading of the conference report, that has been changed and that provision has been abandoned and the principal as well as interest may be appropriated at any time.

Mr. DAWES. I will state to the Senator that the bill as it passed the Senate in this regard was in these words:

And the principal of all sums agreed to be paid by the United States as the purchase-price of any portion of any such reservation shall be payable only to the Indians or Indian tribe from whom such purchase was made by express authority of Congress, after the expiration of twenty-five years from the purchase of said lands; but the same shall, in the meantime, be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe or tribes of Indians entitled thereto; and in the meantime, and until such principal sum shall be paid over to or expended for the benefit of said Indians, the United States shall pay interest annually upon said principal sums at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, which interest shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior for the use and benefit of such Indian tribes, and shall be used for the purpose of educating and preparing them for self-support, and applied to their support and maintenance, as may be necessary.

That was deemed by the Senate a very wise provision. It was stricken out entirely by the other House without any substitute for it, leaving the purchase-money for any portion of the reservation of any tribe to be disposed of just as the United States might choose to dispose of it, unless the Indians who made the agreement with the United States to sell were provident enough to make a condition of sale such as would secure it to them. The conferees on the part of the House insisted that the proceeds of the Indian lands were the common property of the United States, and should be put in the Treasury of the United States, to be appropriated for the benefit of Indians generally. They adhered very strongly to the House amendment to strike out this provision, insisting upon it that the Indians could take care of themselves in making any agreement with the United States to sell, and that it was competent for them to say, we will sell, provided the proceeds of the sale shall be devoted to our use after twenty-five years, or after ten, or after any number of years. It was deemed by the Senate conferees a very dangerous thing to leave it to the discretion of the Indians themselves. They said that if the Indians were as keen as a Yankee they would be likely to make a provident contract; but not yet have they quite arrived at that advanced stage of civilization.

After long conference the conferees agreed to substitute for nothing on the part of the other House and for this provision on the part of the Senate, a stipulation which the Secretary will read. Let the Secretary read the substitute for the amendment that "the principal of all sums agreed to be paid," &c.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Insert in place of the words to be stricken out by said amendment the following words:

"And the sums agreed to be paid by the United States as purchase-money for any portion of any such reservation shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use of the tribe or tribes of Indians to whom such reservations belonged, and the same, with interest thereon at 3 per cent. per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of such tribe or tribes of Indians or the members thereof."

And that the House agree to the same.

Mr. DAWES. The difference, the Senator will see, between that and the text as it went from the Senate is this: "It enables the United States, in cases where they think the exigencies of the Indians require it, to make an appropriation from time to time to these funds for the very purposes that the Senator sought to secure by his amendment." It also provides that instead of its being at 5 per cent. interest while it remains in the Treasury it shall be at 3.

The conferees on the part of the House were unwilling to put it beyond the control of Congress in all cases for twenty-five years. They thought and I think there are cases, and we have had an experience in dealing with Indians where there are cases, where it is wise to take a portion of the principal for present exigencies or future exigencies of the Indians, and it is better than it is to wait twenty-five years. The objection to it is that it will be an improvident appropriation from time to time, that it will be frittered away, that the Indian or some person in the interest of the Indian will be coming here to get portions of it taken until it gets away. That is the danger of it, but it was impossible to get the conferees on the part of the House to agree to tie it up absolutely for twenty-five years.

The other change is the difference between 5 per cent. and 3 per cent. interest. Five per cent. is the uniform rate of interest paid for Indian funds, and the answer to that on the part of the House was that that rate was established at a time when all interest was at that high rate; all interest now is at 3 per cent. and less, and they insisted upon those two amendments, and the Senate yielded.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Massachusetts has concluded I desire to say a word.

I understand now the effect of the modified amendment of the House in regard to the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of the surplus lands of the reservation. I do not think the Senator is right in saying that the main object to be secured by the Senate amendment was to prevent an improvident disposition of the proceeds of these lands. The provision in the Senate bill for the retention of the principal of the proceeds of these lands in the Treasury for twenty-five years was prepared by myself, and after discussion and consultation with the committee I understood the committee to favor the proposition. I do not understand that the committee now have concluded that the provision was not a wise one.

There are some two hundred and fifty thousand Indians in the United States who are the wards of the Government. We control their persons, to a certain extent, and their property. We make large annual appropriations out of the Treasury for their maintenance and their support. What I fear is that if the reservations are allotted to Indians in severalty and made alienable after twenty-five years and the residue of the reservations sold and the money placed in the Treasury and from time to time appropriated for the benefit of the Indians, we shall have this state of facts within a very few years after the expiration of the twenty-five years when the lands allotted to them are alienable: As soon as they come in control of these lands they will pass out of their control, be sold, the proceeds squandered, and the proceeds of the sale of their lands will have been exhausted by Congressional appropriations for their benefit in the mean time, and they will not have been prepared by the policy of the Government to be self-supporting; and the result will be that we shall have a quarter of a million paupers, or more, on the hands of the Government, to be supported by annual appropriations from the Treasury.

Therefore, in order that there may be economy in the money which we appropriate for their use during this period of twenty-five years, economy in the disposition of the moneys which belong to them, the proceeds of the sales of their reservations, in order that they may not be paupers at the end of these twenty-five years, I desire to retain the principal of the proceeds of the sale of their lands for their use at the expiration of that time; and I think it is a very dangerous policy even to announce that the money shall be expended, that appropriation shall be made.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator goes upon the ground that there will not be any future Congress nearly as wise as this. That may perhaps be the case, though I shall not speak with any great confidence of it. We have got to trust future Congresses in a great many things, and while I agree with the Senator that I would like to put this beyond the reach of future Congresses, I would not give up this whole bill for that.

I want to say further that there were a great many suggestions of improvement of this bill which reached the committee of conference. After both Houses had passed upon the bill some very valuable suggestions came from the executive department and others from other quarters, but it was impossible for the committee of conference to embrace any new matter in their report not passed upon by either House. I make this statement so that those who are interested in these suggestions of improvement will know why they do not appear in this bill. It was not because the suggestions were not wise in themselves, but because they came too late to be incorporated in the bill.

Why the bill has this difference in it from the bill as it passed the Senate I have sufficiently explained. To my mind it is not a very great objection to this bill that we trust future Congresses to say when they will make appropriations from the principal of this fund. I believe that it had better be kept in most cases entire on interest, but there are cases to-day and there will arise every year cases where it will be the wisest thing in the world to take some portion of the principal for pressing exigencies.

Mr. DOLPH. Why not make appropriations from the general fund in the Treasury as we do now in such cases?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will go upon the Committee on Appropriations and get a little experience in that matter, he will see why anybody who has been on that committee does not like to trust to that source.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not think the suggestion that I suppose future Congresses will not be as wise as the present one was called forth by any remark I made. We are now passing a law that is in the nature of an agreement and contract with these Indians, and certainly it is prudent to put it in the best shape in which it can be placed. That was the cause of my remark, not that I supposed there was to be no wisdom or disposition to economy in any future Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

A bill (H. R. 6026) granting a pension to John Selby.

ALLEGED OUTRAGE IN TEXAS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Stephen A. Hackworth, James L. Moore, and Carl Schutze, citizens of the State of Texas and of the United States, residents of Washington County, Texas, showing that they have been denied their rights as such citizens by the citizens and the constituted authorities of said county, and appealing for redress to the Government of the United States, to report two resolutions, the second of which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Whereas Stephen A. Hackworth, a native citizen of the United States and of the State of Texas; James L. Moore, a native of Alabama, and now for twenty years a citizen of Texas; and Carl Schutze, a native of Germany, for thirty years a resident of the United States, and now a naturalized citizen thereof, have presented their petition to the Senate, wherein they allege that they have been driven from their homes in Washington County, Texas, and compelled to abandon their property at a great sacrifice, and that armed and lawless bands of ruffians have taken possession of and destroyed the ballot-boxes in said county at a late election therein for county officers and members of Congress, and have murdered three citizens of said county, and overthrown republican government therein, and committed other outrages and crimes, all of which have been done in order that the majority of the voters therein may be deprived of their lawful and constitutional right of suffrage, and that the minority may unlawfully usurp and exercise control in said county, and that the constituted authorities of said county and State refuse all remedy for said outrages and crimes;

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into all the circumstances of, and connected with, the said alleged events, and that it report as soon as may be; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to act by any subcommittee, and that any such subcommittee shall, for the purposes of such investigation, be a committee of the Senate to all intents and purposes.

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of said committee in said investigation be paid out of the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman thereof.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the resolutions lie over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that the resolutions are reported by the committee of which I am a member without my consent. I recorded my vote against them in the committee, and I shall record my vote against them in the Senate.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to make the same statement as a member of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the resolutions and the memorial on which they are based be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial and resolutions will be printed under the general rule, and will be placed on the Calendar under objection.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator from Texas has no objection to having the second resolution referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires the reference, but no action can be taken if a single objection is made.

Mr. HARRIS. The memorial can not be printed under the general rule for printing unless the Senate orders it. The resolution can be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is only the report that will be printed necessarily, but if there be no objection the order to print the memorial and report will be entered.

Mr. HOAR. And the second resolution referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that will be done.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. MAHONE. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., have directed me to report it without amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if he will not have that bill put on its passage at once. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill at the present time. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I gave notice yesterday morning that I would object to calling up bills out of their order, because I think we ought to devote the morning hour to the regular call of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BUTLER. It will not require three minutes to read and dispose of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. That may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. KLEINER, and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections, ske a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TURNER, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. PAYNE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta Drum Hunt, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SCOTT, Mr. ELDREDGE, and Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.;

A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce;

A bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyright;

A bill (S. 2220) granting a pension to James G. Mathes;

A bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the heirs of Malitty Rose;

A bill (S. 2369) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Price;

A bill (S. 2721) to remove the political disabilities of John K. Mitchell; and

A bill (S. 2848) for the relief of Benjamin P. Loyall, of the State of Virginia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 3207) to amend an act entitled "An act defining butter, also imposing a tax upon and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committe on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3208) for the relief of Henry M. Rector; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 3209) for the relief of the Sisters of the Holy Cross, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3210) granting a pension to Ellen Smith;

A bill (S. 3211) granting a pension to Asa Wilson;

A bill (S. 3212) granting a pension to William M. Houghton; and

A bill (S. 3213) granting a pension to Elvira A. Pierce.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3214) to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 3215) to amend chapter 35 of the Acts of Congress, approved February 8, 1881, entitled "An act to provide for the furnishing of certain public documents to soldiers' homes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. INGALLS. I also introduce a bill (S. 3216) to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

This bill was prepared at the Department of Justice and transmitted to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber and at whose request I introduce the bill, saying for him that, while not vouching for its provisions, he has no doubt that the subject is one which requires early attention by the committee. It is accompanied by certain papers that I ask may be referred to the committee with the bill.

The bill was read twice by its title, and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANDERSON. At the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] I introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 3217), granting a pension to Hannah Phillips, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 3218) granting an increase of pension to Maria Hunter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an executive department to be known as the department of agriculture and labor; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3026) granting to the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3041) granting the Spokane and Palouse Railway Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, after eighty years had gone by the Congress of the United States passed a law empowering and instructing the Court of Claims to ascertain the liability, if any, of the Government to the citizens of the United States on account of French spoliation, and, if any, to whom and for what amount. That court has determined these questions in respect of four claimants and reported to Congress, as required by the terms of the law, their findings; and to cover the awards made by the court in these cases, I propose an amendment to the sundry civil bill, and ask its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

COMPILATION OF VETO MESSAGES.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the compilation of the veto messages of the Presidents of the United States, made in obedience to a resolution passed by the Senate on the 24th of July, 1886, be printed, and that 3,000 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

PAYMENT OF SENATORS' SALARIES.

Mr. MAHONE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to report to the Senate from what time, according to custom and precedent, the salary of Senators is reckoned and paid.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I find the following on page 952:

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] asked me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. If the Senator from North Carolina were present he would vote "yea."

That statement is entirely correct, but it leaves the inference that if I had been present I should have voted "nay." If I had been present, I should have voted for the passage of the bill.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL. If the morning business is through, I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which I have urged before the Senate; and I ask for a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further "concurrent or other resolutions?" If not, the morning hour is closed. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, instructing the Attorney-General to bring suit for an injunction against the Florida Railway and Navigation Company. On that question the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is not at all pleasant to me to oppose any wish of the Senator from Florida in respect to a matter that concerns his own State, and I should not do so if I did not feel that this resolution, if adopted in the terms in which it stands, would be entirely useless, and would also commit the Senate to a line of action that I think would be very improper.

A bill is pending now before the Committee on Public Lands having for its purpose the forfeiture of the land grant to which the resolution refers. That bill covers all the ground that is designed to be taken by the Senator from Florida, I suppose. The opinion of the Interior Department in reference to the propriety of such a measure was requested by the Committee on Public Lands. I read the other day, when the subject was under debate, the reply of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in regard to this bill. That reply shows, as I think, that the bill itself is open to very grave objection. The matter is now pending in the Committee of Public Lands, and will be very soon considered. Indeed I may state that the committee have agreed that they will consider this bill on next Monday, the first committee meeting day.

It is an intricate subject, very involved. The facts about it are not definitely ascertained; the official facts, the facts to be gathered from official records, are certainly not; but other statements which have been made in respect to the bill and the propriety of its passage are dependent upon a condition of facts that we have not yet been able to get hold of. The committee have been urged to report that bill for quite a while, but they have not acted upon it and have not made a report, in the hope that they will be supplied by the parties interested with sufficient information to justify whatever report they may see proper to make.

Now the Senator from Florida comes in with a resolution, entitled "a joint resolution." Of course, upon its being adopted it will become a law. The object of the resolution is to effect what was intended to be effected by this bill, and a good deal more. It proceeds in the first section, which is now abandoned by the Senator from Florida, to forfeit the land grant of this railroad company; and in the second section the Attorney-General of the United States is instructed to bring suit, through the district attorneys of the United States, for an injunction against the Florida Navigation and Railway Corporation or their agents, attempting to sell, or selling, or advertising for sale the lands of the United States embraced in the grant made to the State of Florida under the act entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," approved May 17, 1856, while bills for the forfeiture of the same shall be pending before Congress, which have been or shall be recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

Waiving for the present the peculiar character of this resolution of instruction to the Attorney-General, I wish to state that this committee, at least I, as a member of it—and I am satisfied it is true in respect to all the members of the committee—were not informed of the fact which the Senator from Florida now seems to think is the vital turning point in this case, until he submitted his remarks to the Senate the other day, within the space of seven or eight days—I do not remember precisely when he first made the statement in the Senate—that the State of Florida had never given its assent to the grant of this land to the Florida Railroad Company, or any of its successors. The committee have been entirely ignorant upon that proposition and that question; they have had no information from any source of the existence of this state of facts, or this alleged state of facts.

When they were informed of it, as soon as the committee could get together, the persons who were representing this railroad company, and who have always been very vigilant about the rights that they claimed, were notified of this statement, and they say to us that they can overturn it, that they can satisfy the Senate that the State of Florida has given its consent to this grant. I have not had the opportunity of looking over the statutes of the State of Florida which affect this subject, and I do not understand that they have been put in the RECORD by the Senator. I have not seen them. Have they been put in the RECORD in full?

Mr. CALL. They have been put in the RECORD to such an extent as to show that the State of Florida in 1858, upon the recommendation of the governor and the opinion of the attorney-general, and by an almost unanimous vote of the Legislature, refused to allow the Florida Railroad Company to have the benefit of this grant, and incorporated another company and gave to it the benefit of the grant.

Mr. MORGAN. That is quite a different answer from what I expected. I expected the answer to state this proposition, that the statutes of Florida had been put in the RECORD, all of them which showed any right on the part of this railroad company to this land grant.

Mr. CALL. They have.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a proposition upon which there is controversy. This railroad company and its successors claim that it had the consent of the State of Florida to the land grant, and demand from this committee a right to show that it has. This committee have warned those persons that they must make this proof by next Monday, the time the committee meets again, in order that we can have a fair chance to weigh both sides of this question and not be acting in the dark. They controvert the position of the Senator from Florida. Pending this controversy, will the Senate of the United States take this bill out of the hands of the committee so far as to authorize a suit for an injunction to be brought by the Attorney-General of the United States to enjoin further proceedings of the railroad company in the sale or disposal of any of these lands? I do not, for one, feel disposed to venture upon ground of that kind until both sides can have an opportunity for a hearing. I do not think it would be just to the committee or to the parties interested that we should rush along and make this rash disposition of this case while a committee of the Senate are laboriously and earnestly looking into the matter to ascertain whether there is ground of relief in this case.

Now I will advert to the statement made this moment by the Senator from Florida, that in 1858, I believe the Senator said it was, the Legislature of Florida denied that the Florida Railroad Company, whose property is here sought to be confiscated or to be forfeited, had the right to these lands and conferred the right upon another company. That matter is, I think, easy of explanation.

This grant was made, as the resolution recites, May 17, 1856, for a railroad extending from Fernandina on the Atlantic coast to Cedar Keys on the Gulf coast, with a branch road running down to Tampa Bay. That was in 1856. Before 1860, before more than four years of the time within which this road was to be completed had expired, this railroad was built and completed and running from Fernandina, in Florida, across to Cedar Keys. A somewhat greater distance of the road had been graded and cross-ties prepared upon it and the work was being prosecuted with vigor, and would have been completed at least within the period of ten years, from the place where it leaves the main line down to Tampa Bay, but for the fact that the war came on and suspended all operations upon that part of the road.

Just here it is worthy of remark that this railroad company has been more diligent, or was, up to the time of the occurrence of the war, more diligent in the building of its line of railroad than any railroad company in the United States, I think, having a land grant; for it had built practically two-thirds of the lineal extent of its entire line from Tampa Bay leading up to the point of intersection with the main line—I forget the name of the town at that point. Of course the war not only interrupted the building of this road, but there is a letter here from one of the engineers who was engaged in building it who traversed on foot the entire length of the road several times after the war had concluded, and he found that the iron had been taken up by the confederate authorities for miles and miles and transferred to other roads and put he did not know where. The cross-ties had rotted; the bridges had become rotten, the road having gone into disuse. The houses for the accommodation of the trains on the road had been torn down or burned up. So the road by the war was made a complete wreck. It was put into bankruptcy by the war.

It was then a matter of impossibility that that road should progress until it had received assistance from other sources. Nevertheless this corporation went to work upon it in good faith, and acquiring capital from other parts of the country commenced to rebuild it. They also commenced to complete that part of the road which had been graded in the direction of Tampa Bay and progressed with considerable rapidity in that way. Nevertheless the road was largely encumbered. Its franchises and property of every kind were necessarily put under mortgage to raise money to go on with the construction of the road.

After the war was over another railroad company sprang up in Florida —I believe it was called the Peninsular Railroad Company—for the purpose of taking this property out of the hands of the old company and building the road; and the controversy, as I understand it, is now really between that other company and the company whose property is now sought to be forfeited. The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman had not been decided. The Legislature of Florida and all other people almost, except the Supreme Court of the United States, conceived the idea, which was certainly a very plausible one, that under the ten-year limitations and grants, the express language of the statute being that if the road was not completed within ten years the property should revert to the United States, the property did revert the instant that the ten years expired without the road having been completely built; that unless the condition of the act had been complied with within the ten years the land reverted to the United States Government.

That was the prevailing opinion. Mr. Secretary Chandler had that opinion, and he, upon an application being made by this railroad company to withdraw the lands from market in order that it might enjoy the benefits of the grant, ruled that all interest in that grant had been forfeited; that it had entirely lapsed, because the ten years had expired before the roads were completed, and as to this branch to Tampa Bay before, as he alleged, anything had been done during the lifetime of the grant. Under the influence of that decision the railroad company were declared to have no right, and the lands were put upon the market. In fact Mr. Chandler made an order that the lands should be open to entry as other public domain in the United States, and so the matter went along.

But after the decision of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, Mr. Secretary Schurz, upon a petition to review the former decision upon the ground of a mistake in law as well as a mistake of fact, did review it and did reverse it, and he held that these lands were still subject to the grant; that the fee was in the railroad company subject to be divested only on forfeiture being declared by Congress.

Pending this interregnum, after Mr. Chandler had made his decision that these lands were part of the public domain and that the grant in favor of the Florida Railroad Company had lapsed because the road had not been completed within ten years, the Florida Legislature commenced its proceeding to make a new grant of this land to a new company in the hope of thereby reviving it or getting Congress to revive it, and getting the benefit to the State and the community down there of this land grant.

The Legislature of Florida in this action, of which the Senator speaks, was just as mistaken as anybody else about the rights of this railroad company, and it was not legislating for the purpose of declaring that the company had no rights because it had not complied with certain provisions of the Florida law, but it was legislating to make a declaration following that of Mr. Chandler (and confirming it, contrary to the decision in Schulenberg vs. Harriman, afterwards made), that this grant had lapsed because the ten years had expired before the completion of the road. Reading in the light of these facts that statute of Florida, it is very easy to understand that the Legislature of Florida never intended to deny the rights that had been conferred upon this Florida Railroad Company, but merely taking it for granted, as everybody did, that these rights had absolutely lapsed, the Legislature was free to go on to organize a new company or permit its organization, and to claim for that company the land grant which had been made.

Mr. GEORGE. Was that action before the decision referred to?

Mr. MORGAN. The dates are here. We shall see.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator from Florida to say that the action of the Legislature was long prior to that.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Mississippi is entirely correct. The Legislature of Florida, in 1858, upon the recommendation of the governor, denied the right of the Florida Railroad Company to the benefit of this grant and granted it to another company. I have the act right here in my hand.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that?

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Alabama why not have this matter go to the Committee on Public Lands and have the facts ascertained?

Mr. MORGAN. That is my motion. I am insisting on it now.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I will tell the Senator from Kentucky why.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to go on.

Mr. BECK. The subject is pending before a committee and this is a resolution about that subject. Why not have a report of the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I want. The Senator from Florida brings facts before the Senate not known to the committee, and, I dare say, not known to the Senator twenty days ago.

Mr. CALL. A long time ago, all my life.

Mr. MORGAN. If he has known them all his life, the Senator is a younger man than I thought he was. I venture that the Senator from Florida did not intend to make this point twenty days ago, and that he did not know, although he might have surmised, the condition of the statutory enactments of Florida on this subject twenty days ago. The matter has been sprung on the Senate and on the committee, and I object to it. I want a fair showing about this matter. Let every man have a fair chance before the committee, no matter what his rights may be, whether he is interested in a railroad or not. When you bring men up for judgment let them have a fair trial.

I am giving you the interpretation of this proceeding as it is given to me by the counsel of the railroad company. Whether that is correct or not I am not prepared to vouch; but if we are to act as judges in this matter I think it is my duty to listen when suggestions are made, and then to arrive at a knowledge of the facts and decide fairly and impartially between the parties. That is my idea of my duty. While I would be perfectly willing to accommodate the Senator from Florida in any particular, I am not willing as a member of the Senate, and particularly as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, to have this matter taken out of our hands in this way and the Senate sit in judgment on that which the committee have had no opportunity to report and no opportunity to understand.

Mr. GEORGE. Did not the Senator from Florida point out the act of the Florida Legislature forfeiting the lands of this railroad company?

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the counsel for this railroad company take the ground that the State of Florida had granted land under its general internal-improvement law; a bill was passed by which a grant was made of lands to trustees in trust that they were under certain regulations to dispose of the proceeds of certain lands in Florida to internal improvements, this company being one of them. They claim now that these trustees under this general internal-improvement law received a large body of lands which had been granted to the State of Florida under the swamp and overflowed land law; that Florida intended to convey those lands to the different railroad companies mentioned in the law, and also intended to prepare in advance of action by Congress, which was the fact, that these same trustees should have the management of such land grant as Congress might thereafter make or might before that time have made in aid of the same roads. So the act of the Florida Legislature in organizing this board of trustees to hold the title was an act that related to the land that belonged to the State of Florida under the swamp-land law, and also related to such grants as Congress might make thereafter to these same railroad companies. That was the situation.

It will be perceived by the Senate that two classes of lands would fall into the hands of these trustees: one, lands belonging to the State and transferred to them as a public trust; the other, lands that might be granted directly by an act of Congress.

The act of Congress which is the subject of this controversy now was passed after the internal-improvement act of the Florida Legislature. That act of Congress named this corporation in the act as being one of the three in whose behalf this grant was made. The grant was made eo nomine to the State of Florida, but for the benefit and for the purpose of constructing three railroads, of which the road in question to-day was one.

Now these gentlemen allege against the position taken by the Senator from Florida, that the State of Florida has no other act upon the subject; that while it never made a law conferring the title of these lands upon either of these three railroad companies, it had previously provided that these titles should go into the hands of the trustees of the general-improvement fund, the internal-improvement act standing as the means of taking in, appropriating, and applying all of the grants that Congress made to these three railroads; that no special act of the Florida Legislature was necessary, because this railroad company was mentioned in the internal-improvement act as one of the roads to which the lands should be applied, and that therefore it does not appear affirmatively upon the legislation of the State of Florida that this railroad, by that name, had any separate and special act in its behalf conferring upon it these lands; but they insist that the general-improvement act of Florida being for the purpose of constructing this very road named in the act covers the case and transfers the land, if not by legal title, at least by a perfect equity, through the hands of these trustees of the internal-improvement fund of Florida into the rightful possession and ownership of this railroad company.

It is alleged, also, as I understand, by the Senator from Florida, that some conditions were imposed by the act of Florida; for instance, that a map should be filed within a certain time, or, if I am not mistaken in that, that the consent of the railroad to accept the grant should be filed within a certain time. Upon inquiry made as to whether these formalities had been complied with, these lawyers said, "Yes, and we can prove it by next Monday." Upon being asked whether or not a literal compliance had been made, they said, yes, they could establish it.

But it is beyond all controversy that the State of Florida, without objection, saw this railroad company go on to the completion of its road, enabled it to receive without objection, and it did receive without objection, that part of the land grant which Florida made to the railroad company, and I think it is rather sharp conduct to say that that State never consented to this railroad receiving the grant of the United States Government, when the Congress in passing the law named this railroad and did not name any other except the other two that were in the act, but certainly named no successor to it, and gave Florida no right to appoint another railroad to the enjoyment of this grant of the Government of the United States, except that named in the act. I will read from the act of Congress to show its terms:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Florida, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads from Saint John's River, at Jacksonville, to the waters of Escambia Bay, at or near Pensacola; and from Amelia Island, on the Atlantic, to the waters of Tampa Bay, with a branch to Cedar Key, on the Gulf of Mexico.

That is this road.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not name the company.

Mr. MORGAN. You mean it does not designate the corporation.

Mr. GEORGE. The State is authorized to provide for a road between those points.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good; the act of Florida did contain the names of these companies.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Alabama is entirely wrong in all his statements.

Mr. MORGAN. Let us come down to particulars. I know I am not wrong in all my statements or in all my facts.

Mr. CALL. The act did not confer upon the Florida Railroad Company or any other railroad company any right to any part of that land.

Mr. MORGAN. Did it not contain these three lines by express mention?

Mr. CALL. What three lines?

Mr. MORGAN. Those I read here of course.

Mr. CALL. It did not mention any railroad company.

Mr. MORGAN. Did it not say that the grant was to be applied to these three lines of road?

Mr. CALL. It did not.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read it, and let us see.

Mr. CALL. Probably I had better read to you what the governor of the State says.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I want to read the act of Congress.

Mr. CALL. I can not lay my hand on the act of Florida itself, but I will read the act from the pamphlet in my hand which cites it. Section 4 is what is referred to I presume:

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That a line of railroad from the Saint John's River, at Jacksonville, and the waters of Pensacola Bay, with an extension from suitable points on said line to Saint Mark's River, or Crooked River, at White Bluff, on Appalachicola Bay, in Middle Florida, and to the waters of Saint Andrew's Bay, in West Florida, and a line from Amelia Island, on the Atlantic, to the waters of Tampa Bay, in South Florida, with an extension to Cedar Key, in East Florida; also a canal from the waters of Saint John's River, on Lake Harney, to the waters of Indian River, are proper improvements to be aided from the internal-improvement fund, in manner as hereinafter provided.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all I wanted to know. Now, the Senate see that the grant to these trustees of this property, owned by Florida, was made for the benefit of the same lines of railroad that are mentioned in the very same language in the act of Congress. I think it would take a very sharp lawyer to have anticipated that any question would ever be made as to the right of this railroad company to these lands when the railroad company was already chartered and was ready to build the road, and it went on immediately afterward and built the road from Amelia Island to Cedar Keys, and commenced the construction of and built 30 or 50 miles of it, also from the point of junction on the line toward Tampa Bay.

I understand that that criticism upon the action of the State of Florida and of the United States Government is entirely hypercritical, and that the point that the Senator from Florida thinks so entirely solid has really no solidity in it, and certainly no equity and no justice.

Mr. CALL. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. MORGAN. I mean this, that because we can not trace, or it is said we can not trace, in some special act of Congress or of the Florida Legislature following the act of Congress a particular corporation named which should enjoy the grant, therefore Florida has never given its consent to it.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to interrupt him. This is the proposition I have made: First, that the State of Florida never granted to the Florida Railroad Company the benefit of this grant of May, 1856; and, secondly, that the Florida Legislature, by expressed act of the Legislature upon the opinion of the attorney-general, refused to grant to this company the benefits of that act for any part of the line of the road—expressly refused.

Mr. MORGAN. That act of the Florida Legislature, if tested in court, would probably be found to be entirely invalid.

Mr. CALL. Why?

Mr. MORGAN. Because it is an ex post facto act to divest property which the railroad company had enjoyed, and was intended to enjoy, under a grant made by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CALL. It was passed in 1858 by the Florida Legislature, and the attorney-general of the State and the governor declared that the Florida Railroad Company had never availed itself, or sought to avail itself, of the line to Tampa.

Mr. MORGAN. That opinion of the attorney-general is quoted continually here as being the final and decisive opinion of this whole question. The Senate of the United States can not afford to accept that opinion. I have the greatest doubt about it both as a matter of law and as a matter of justice.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama to state to the Senate that when the State authorities, by whose approval the location of a grant may be made, have decided that a particular company has no right or interest in it whatever, has never complied with the conditions of which they are the sole judges, the Senate of the United States, the Interior Department, or anybody else, can set up its judgment against that of the State?

Mr. MORGAN. Most unquestionably whenever it is ascertained that the State of Florida had made a previous grant, or had taken previous action, which vested rights in this railroad company, it has no power to divest them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I would ask the consent of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the pending resolution, and that it be determined by vote of the Senate. It is a matter of very great importance to thousands of people whose homes are threatened in the State of Florida, and it ought not to take a very long time. I have been endeavoring to get a vote upon it, and have given way pretty often. I ask the Senate that it be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the pending resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I must object, and I desire to say to the Senator from Florida that he will remember himself that at the close of the last session I gave notice that on the first day of the present session I should call up the proposed woman suffrage amendment which has been pending in this body and in Congress for twenty or twenty-five years without ever having reached a vote at all. On the second day of the session, the first not being available for that purpose, I did call up the resolution accordingly, and proceeded to discuss the subject, and it was in order for final action, but the opponents of the measure desired that it be delayed on account of the sickness and consequent absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], a member of the committee, who desired to be heard on the subject. It was so arranged, and an order of the Senate made, which appears in the RECORD, that it should be laid aside with the privileges of unfinished business, to be called up at any time. With that understanding the matter was laid aside for the time being.

The Senator from Georgia appeared soon after the holiday vacation was over, and as soon as he could conveniently fix the time when he could address the Senate I gave notice that I should call up the joint resolution. Last week I gave that notice and stated fully all these circumstances. I have given notice twice this week that this morning at the close of the morning business I desired the consideration of this joint resolution. The morning hour has been occupied as it has been, and now I desire to ask that the unfinished business, the regular order, be informally laid aside that we may proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution referred to. Therefore I object to the request of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to the request last made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made to the further consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Florida; and now the Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to lay aside the regular order, which is the agricultural experiment-station bill——

Mr. HARRIS. To which I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears two objections.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to laying aside informally the unfinished business for the purpose suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move that it be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. That motion is not in order, to lay aside informally.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire has a right to move to proceed to the consideration of his measure.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not desire to displace the bill which is to-day's unfinished business, and with the understanding that I will do anything and everything to replace that bill in its proper position, I will make the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution referred to.

Mr. CALL. I thought I had the floor, and it was my purpose to make a motion to continue my resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. Any remarks are by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALL. It was my purpose to have moved to continue the consideration of the resolution. I so stated, but the Senator from Alabama objected to the further consideration of it. I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire that we have been discussing this matter at intervals for several days, and facts have been stated and propositions made here which ought not to go uncontradicted. I will say to him that the homes of many people are advertised for sale, and great consternation is felt among the people who own these little pieces of property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator from Florida that the objection to the further consideration of his resolution has not been withdrawn and his remarks are not in order.

Mr. CALL. I am proceeding by unanimous consent, and I am appealing to the Senator from New Hampshire to enable me to make my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. If it is to be debated I want to answer the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BECK. I ask consent to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky can proceed if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. I gave notice yesterday that I would call up to-day a bill which I had up at one time and which was passed by a large vote, and on the motion of the present occupant of the chair it was reconsidered, known as the railroad attorneys' bill, and which has been delayed from time to time to accommodate gentlemen. I have been appealed to by a number of persons who are interested in the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire to give way until that can be heard. I do not want to give way, and yet I do not want to object. A lady sent for me two or three times this morning, but I declined to go to see her. I refer to Miss Anthony. I think we should arrange in some way or other to have that joint resolution disposed of and then let the bill I have charge of come up next. If that can be done I am willing to have it done. I am willing to consent to any arrangement that gives a chance to put my bill through.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say in reply, first to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida, that his resolution occupies the morning hour. It practically by parliamentary law occupies a preferred position, and he will be sure to get the resolution up to-morrow morning during the morning hour. It is a resolution which really is perhaps, as the Senator from Alabama has stated, somewhat abruptly forced upon the attention of the Senate and has occupied considerable time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it his duty to call the Senator to order. Objection has been made and it has not been withdrawn. It is hardly worth while to discuss it.

Mr. BLAIR. I made a motion and I was simply replying to the suggestions of both Senators, and at no greater length certainly than they had made those suggestions. I have said all I wish in reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida. His matter will be up. There will be no trouble about that.

So far as the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is concerned, I shall be glad to reciprocate in any way I can to get early action on his bill. I think he ought to have it. I ask action on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR. It is Order of Business 122.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that motion in order until the unfinished business has been disposed of? It would be perfectly competent for the Senator from New Hampshire to move to postpone the further consideration of the unfinished business until to-morrow or indefinitely; but it must be disposed of and displaced from its position of unfinished business before the motion suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire can be in order. He can not unite the two motions in one. He may move to postpone, if he chooses, and take the sense of the Senate upon that. Then he may move, if the Senate postpone, to proceed to the consideration of the matter that he proposes to consider, but not until then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is inclined to accept the opinion of the learned Senator from Tennessee on that point.

Mr. BLAIR. I submit, then, for the motion already made, one that the unfinished business be postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senato r from New Hampshire.

Mr. HARRIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GEORGE. Before I vote on that I should like to have an inquiry answered. Would the effect of the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire be to leave the experiment-station bill as the unfinished business to-morrow at 2 o'clock? Will that be its position at that time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suppose so, but he prefers to refer the question to Senators who are more familiar with parliamentary law.

Mr. HARRIS. I should think it would come up to-morrow as unfinished business unless this matter should be left unfinished at the adjournment to-day.

Mr. BLAIR. There can not be any doubt about that. That was the Senator's suggestion before I made the motion.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish only to say one word. The agricultural experiment-station bill is the unfinished business now, as it was before the holidays. I have yielded to everybody, wishing to be accommodating, and I am willing still to yield for this day; but I am unwilling to consent to any action of the Senate which shall take the experiment-station bill from the Calendar as unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not desire that any such action be taken by the Senate. I ask for a vote, and the yeas and nays have been called for.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, in order to accommodate all, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be passed over informally until to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to postpone until 2 o'clock to-morrow the further consideration of the regular order for to-day, the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. If that motion passes I shall then move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire (putting the question). The noes appear to have it.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the exact motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to postpone until 2 o'clock to-morrow the regular order for to-day, the unfinished business being the agricultural experiment-station bill; and on that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I would vote for the motion if I thought it would leave the bill which is the unfinished business in its present position on the Calendar; but if there is any doubt about that I will vote against it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. Does his colleague know how he would vote upon this question?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not.

Mr. HARRIS. I withhold my vote because of the pair. I do not know how the Senator from Vermont would vote. I should vote "nay" if I were not paired.

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am generally paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL]. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Beck,	Conger,	Hawley,	Ransom,
Blair,	Cullom,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Brown,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BLAIR. I now move that the Senate proceed to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the joint resolution introduced by my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, conferring the right to vote upon the women of the United States, is one of paramount importance, as it involves great questions far reaching in their tendency, which seriously affect the very pillars of our social fabric, which involve the peace and harmony of society, the unity of the family, and much of the future success of our Government. The question should therefore be met fairly and discussed with firmness, but with moderation and forbearance.

No one contributes anything valuable to the debate by the use of harsh terms, or by impugning motives, or by disparaging the arguments of the opposition. Where the prosperity of the race and the peace of society are involved, we should, on both sides, meet fairly the arguments of our respective opponents.

This question has been discussed a great deal outside of Congress, sometimes in bad temper and sometimes illogically and unprofitably, but the advocates of the proposed amendment and the opponents of it have each put forth, probably in their strongest form, the reasons and arguments which are considered by each as conclusive in favor of the cause they advocate. I do not expect to contribute much that is new on a subject that has been so often and so ably discussed; but what I have to say will be in the main a reproduction in substance of what I and others have already said on the subject, and which I think important enough to be placed upon the record in the argument of the case.

In connection with my friend, the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], I have in a report set forth substantially the reasons and arguments which to my mind establish the fact that the proposed legislation would be injudicious and unwise, and I shall not hesitate to reiterate here such portions of what was then said as seem to me to be important.

I believe that the Creator intended that the sphere of the males and females of our race should be different, and that their duties and obligations, while they differ materially, are equally important and equally honorable, and that each sex is equally well qualified by natural endowments for the discharge of the important duties which pertain to each, and that each sex is equally competent to discharge those duties.

We find an abundance of evidence, both in the works of nature and in the Divine revelation, to establish the fact that the family properly regulated is the foundation and pillar of society, and is the most important of any other human institution.

In the Divine economy it is provided that the man shall be the head of the family, and shall take upon himself the solemn obligation of providing for and protecting the family.

Man, by reason of his physical strength, and his other endowments and faculties, is qualified for the discharge of those duties that require strength and ability to combat with the sterner realities and difficulties of life. The different classes of outdoor labor which require physical strength and endurance are by nature assigned to man, the head of the family, as part of his task. He discharges such labors as require greater physical endurance and strength than the female sex are usually found to possess.

It is not only his duty to provide for and protect the family, but as a member of the community it is also his duty to discharge the laborious and responsible obligations which the family owe to the State, and which obligations must be discharged by the head of the family, until the male members of the family have grown up to manhood and are able to aid in the discharge of those obligations, when it becomes their duty each in his turn to take charge of and rear a family, for which he is responsible.

Among other duties which the head of the family owes to the State, is military duty in time of war, which he, when able-bodied, is able to discharge, and which the female members of the family are unable to discharge.

He is also under obligation to discharge jury duty, and by himself or his representatives to perform his part of the labor necessary to construct and keep in order roads, bridges, streets, and all grades of public highways. And in this progressive age upon the male sex is devolved the duty of constructing and operating our railroads, and the engines and other rolling-stock with which they are operated; of building, equipping, and launching, shipping and other water craft of every character necessary for the transportation of passengers and freight upon our rivers, our lakes, and upon the high seas.

The labor in our fields, sowing, cultivating, and reaping crops must be discharged mainly by the male sex, as the female sex, for want of physical strength, are generally unable to discharge these duties. As it is the duty of the male sex to perform the obligations to the State, to society, and to the family, already mentioned, with numerous others that might be enumerated, it is also their duty to aid in the government of the State, which is simply a great aggregation of families. Society can not be preserved nor can the people be prosperous without good government. The government of our country is a government of the people, and it becomes necessary that the class of people upon whom the responsibility rests should assemble together and consider and discuss the great questions of governmental policy which from time to time are presented for their decision.

This often requires the assembling of caucuses in the night time, as well as public assemblages in the daytime. It is a laborious task, for which the male sex is infinitely better fitted than the female sex; and after proper consideration and discussion of the measures that may divide the country from time to time, the duty devolves upon those who are responsible for the government, at times and places to be fixed by law, to meet and by ballot to decide the great questions of government upon which the prosperity of the country depends.

These are some of the active and sterner duties of life to which the male sex is by nature better fitted than the female sex. If in carrying out the policy of the State on great measures adjudged vital such policy should lead to war, either foreign or domestic, it would seem to follow very naturally that those who have been responsible for the management of the State should be the parties to take the hazards and hardships of the struggle.

Here, again, man is better fitted by nature for the discharge of the duty—woman is unfit for it. So much for some of the duties imposed upon the male sex, for the discharge of which the Creator has endowed them with proper strength and faculties.

On the other hand, the Creator has assigned to woman very laborious and responsible duties, by no means less important than those imposed upon the male sex, though entirely different in their character. In the family she is a queen. She alone is fitted for the discharge of the sacred trust of wife and the endearing relation of mother.

While the man is contending with the sterner duties of life, the whole time of the noble, affectionate, and true woman is required in the discharge of the delicate and difficult duties assigned her in the family circle, in her church relations, and in the society where her lot is cast. When the husband returns home weary and worn in the discharge of the difficult and laborious task assigned him, he finds in the good wife solace and consolation, which is nowhere else afforded. If he is despondent and distressed, she cheers his heart with words of kindness; if he is sick or languishing, she soothes, comforts, and ministers to him as no one but an affectionate wife can do. If his burdens are onerous, she divides their weight by the exercise of her love and her sympathy.

But a still more important duty devolves upon the mother. After having brought into existence the offspring of the nuptial union, the children are dependent upon the mother as they are not upon any other human being. The trust is a most sacred, most responsible, and most important one. To watch over them in their infancy, and as the mind begins to expand to train, direct, and educate it in the paths of virtue and usefulness is the high trust assigned to the mother. She trains the twig as the tree should be inclined.

She molds the character. She educates the heart as well as the intellect, and she prepares the future man, now the boy, for honor or dishonor. Upon the manner in which she discharges her duty depends the fact whether he shall in future be a useful citizen or a burden to society. She inculcates lessons of patriotism, manliness, religion, and virtue, fitting the man by reason of his training to be an ornament to society, or dooming him by her neglect to a life of dishonor and shame. Society acts unwisely when it imposes upon her the duties that by common consent have always been assigned to the stronger and sterner sex, and the discharge of which causes her to neglect those sacred and all important duties to her children and to the society of which they are members.

In the church, by her piety, her charity, and her Christian purity, she not only aids society by a proper training of her own children, but the children of others, whom she encourages to come to the sacred altar, are taught to walk in the paths of rectitude, honor, and religion. In the Sunday-school room the good woman is a princess, and she exerts an influence which purifies and ennobles society, training the young in the truths of religion, making the Sunday-school the nursery of the church, and elevating society to the higher planes of pure religion, virtue, and patriotism. In the sick room and among the humble, the poor, and the suffering, the good woman, like an angel of light, cheers the hearts and revives the hopes of the poor, the suffering, and the despondent.

It would be a vain attempt to undertake to enumerate the refining, endearing, and ennobling influences exercised by the true woman in her relations to the family and to society when she occupies the sphere assigned to her by the laws of nature and the Divine inspiration, which are our surest guide for the present and the future life. But how can woman be expected to meet these heavy responsibilities, and to discharge these delicate and most important duties of wife, Christian, teacher, minister of mercy, friend of the suffering, and consoler of the despondent and needy, if we impose upon her the grosser, rougher, and harsher duties which nature has assigned to the male sex?

If the wife and the mother is required to leave the sacred precincts of home, and to attempt to do military duty when the state is in peril; or if she is to be required to leave her home from day to day in attendance upon the court as a juror, and to be shut up in the jury room from night to night with men who are strangers while a question of life or property is being discussed; if she is to attend political meetings, take part in political discussions, and mingle with the male sex at political gatherings; if she is to become an active politician; if she is to attend political caucuses at late hours of the night; if she is to take part in all the unsavory work that may be deemed necessary for the triumph of her party; and if on election day she is to leave her home and go upon the streets electioneering for votes for the candidates who receive her support, and mingling among the crowds of men who gather round the polls, she is to press her way through them to the precinct and deposit her ballot; if she is to take part in the corporate struggles of the city or town in which she resides, attend to the duties of his honor, the mayor, the councilman, or of policeman, to say nothing of the many other like obligations which are disagreeable even to the male sex, how is she, with all these heavy duties of citizen, politician, and officeholder resting upon her shoulders, to attend to the more sacred, delicate, and refining trust to which we have already referred, and for which she is peculiarly fitted by nature? If she is to discharge the duties last mentioned, how is she, in connection with them, to discharge the more refining, elevating, and ennobling duties of wife, mother, Christian, and friend, which are found in the sphere where nature has placed her? Who is to care for and train the children while she is absent in the discharge of these masculine duties?

If it were proper to reverse the order of nature and assign woman to the sterner duties devolved upon the male sex, and to attempt to assign man to the more refining, delicate, and ennobling duties of the woman, man would be found entirely incompetent to the discharge of the obligations which nature has devolved upon the gentler sex, and society must be greatly injured by the attempted change. But if we are told that the object of this movement is not to reverse this order of nature, but only to devolve upon the gentler sex a portion of the more rigorous duties imposed by nature upon the stronger sex, we reply that society must be injured, as the woman would not be able to discharge those duties so well, by reason of her want of physical strength, as the male, upon whom they are devolved, and to the extent that the duties are to be divided, the male would be infinitely less competent to discharge the delicate and sacred trusts which nature has assigned to the female.

But it has been said that the present law is unjust to woman; that she is often required to pay tax on the property she holds without being permitted to take part in framing or administering the laws by which her property is governed, and that she is taxed without representation. That is a great mistake.

It may be very doubtful whether the male or female sex in the present state of things has more influence in the administration of the affairs of the Government and the enactment of the laws by which we are governed.

While the woman does not discharge military duty, nor does she attend courts and serve on juries, nor does she labor on the public streets, bridges, or highways, nor does she engage actively and publicly in the discussion of political affairs, nor does she enter the crowded precincts of the ballot-box to deposit her suffrage, still the intelligent, cultivated, noble woman is a power behind the throne. All her influence is in favor of morality, justice, and fair dealing, all her efforts and her counsel are in favor of good government, wise and wholesome regulations, and a faithful administration of the laws. Such a woman, by her gentleness, kindness, and Christian bearing, impresses her views and her counsels upon her father, her husband, her brothers, her sons, and her other male friends who imperceptibly yield to her influence many times without even being conscious of it. She rules not with a rod of iron, but with the queenly scepter; she binds not with hooks of steel but with silken cords; she governs not by physical efforts, but by moral suasion and feminine purity and delicacy. Her dominion is one of love, not of arbitray power.

We are satisfied, therefore, that the pure, cultivated, and pious ladies of this country now exercise a very powerful, but quiet, imperceptible influence in popular affairs, much greater than they can ever again exercise if female suffrage should be enacted and they should be compelled actively to take part in the affairs of state and the corruptions of party politics.

It would be a gratification, and we are always glad to see the ladies gratified, to many who have espoused the cause of woman suffrage if they could take active part in political affairs, and go to the polls and cast their votes alongside the male sex; but while this would be a gratification to a large number of very worthy and excellent ladies who take a different view of the question from that which we entertain, we feel that it would be a great cruelty to a much larger number of the cultivated, refined, delicate, and lovely women of this country who seek no such distinction, who would enjoy no such privilege, who would with woman-like delicacy shrink from the discharge of any such obligation, and who would sincerely regret that, what they consider the folly of the state, had imposed upon them any such unpleasant duties.

But should female suffrage be once established it would become an imperative necessity that the very large class, indeed much the largest class, of the women of this country of the character last described should yield, contrary to their inclinations and wishes, to the necessity which would compel them to engage in political strife. We apprehend no one who has properly considered this question will doubt if female suffrage should be established that the more ignorant and less refined portions of the female population of this country, to say nothing of the baser class of females, laying aside feminine delicacy and disregarding the sacred duties devolving upon them, to which we have already referred, would rush to the polls and take pleasure in the crowded association which the situation would compel, of the two sexes in political meetings, and at the ballot-box.

If all the baser and more ignorant portion of the female sex crowd to the polls and deposit their suffrage this compels the very large class of intelligent, virtuous, and refined females, including wives and mothers, who have much more important duties to perform, to leave their sacred labors at home, relinquishing for a time the God-given important trust which has been placed in their hands, to go contrary to their wishes to the polls and vote, to counteract the suffrage of the less worthy class of our female population. If they fail to do this the best interests of the country must suffer by a preponderance of ignorance and vice at the polls.

It is now a problem which perplexes the brain of the ablest statesmen to determine how we will best preserve our republican system as against the demoralizing influence of the large class of our present citizens and voters who by reason of their illiteracy are unable to read or write the ballot they cast.

Certainly no statesman who has carefully observed the situation would desire to add very largely to this burden of ignorance. But who does not apprehend the fact if universal female suffrage should be established that we will, especially in the Southern States, add a very large number to the voting population whose ignorance utterly disqualifies them for discharging the trust. If our colored population who were so recently slaves that even the males who are voters have had but little opportunity to educate themselves or to be educated, whose ignorance is now exciting the liveliest interest of our statesmen, are causes of serious apprehension, what is to be said in favor of adding to the voting population all the females of that race, who, on account of the situation in which they have been placed, have had much less opportunity to be educated than even the males of their own race.

We do not say it is their fault that they are not educated, but the fact is undeniable that they are grossly ignorant, with very few exceptions, and probably not one in a hundred of them could read and write the ballot that they would be authorized to cast. What says the statesman to the propriety of adding this immense mass of ignorance to the voting population of the Union in its present condition?

It may be said that their votes could be offset by the ballots of the educated and refined ladies of the white race in the same section; but who does not know that the ignorant female voters would be at the polls en masse, while the refined and educated, shrinking from public contact on such occasions, would remain at home and attend to their domestic and other important duties, leaving the country too often to the control of those who could afford under the circumstances to take part in the strifes of politics, and to come in contact with the unpleasant surroundings before they could reach the polls. Are we ready to expose the country to the demoralization, and our institutions to the strain, which would be placed upon them for the gratification of a minority of the virtuous and good of our female population at the expense of the mortification of a very large majority of the same sex?

It has been frequently urged with great earnestness by those who advocate woman suffrage that the ballot is necessary to the women to enable them to protect themselves in securing occupations, and to enable them to realize the same compensation for the like labor which is received by men. This argument is plausible, but upon a closer examination it will be found to possess but little real force. The price of labor is and must continue to be governed by the law of supply and demand, and the person who has the most physical strength to labor, and the most pursuits requiring such strength open for employment, will always command the higher prices.

Ladies make excellent teachers in public schools; many of them are every way the equals of their male competitors, and still they secure less wages than males. The reason is obvious. The number of ladies who offer themselves as teachers is much larger than the number of males who are willing to teach. The larger number of females offer to teach because other occupations are not open to them. The smaller number of males offer to teach because other more profitable occupations are open to most males who are competent to teach. The result is that the competition for positions of teachers to be filled by ladies is so great as to reduce the price; but as males can not be employed at that price, and are necessary in certain places in the schools, those seeking their services have to pay a higher rate for them.

Persons having a larger number of places open to them with fewer competitors command higher wages than those who have a smaller number of places open to them with more competitors. This is the law of society. It is the law of supply and demand, which can not be changed by legislation. Then it follows that the ballot can not enable those who have to compete with the larger number to command the same prices as those who compete with the smaller number in the labor market. As the Legislature has no power to regulate in practice that of which the advocates of woman suffrage complain, the ballot in the hands of females could not aid its regulation.

The ballot can not impart to the female physical strength which she does not possess, nor can it open to her pursuits which she does not have physical ability to engage in; and as long as she lacks the physical strength to compete with men in the different departments of labor, there will be more competition in her department, and she must necessarily receive less wages.

But it is claimed again, that females should have the ballot as a protection against the tyranny of bad husbands. This is also delusive. If the husband is brutal, arbitrary, or tyrannical, and tyrannizes over her at home, the ballot in her hands would be no protection against such injustice, but the husband who compelled her to conform to his wishes in other respects would also compel her to use the ballot, if she possessed it, as he might please to dictate. The ballot would therefore be of no assistance to the wife in such case, nor could it heal family strifes or dissensions. On the contrary, one of the gravest objections to placing the ballot in the hands of the female sex is that it would promote unhappiness and dissensions in the family circle. There should be unity and harmony in the family.

At present the man represents the family in meeting the demands of the law and of society upon the family. So far as the rougher, coarser duties are concerned, the man represents the family, and the individuality of the woman is not brought into prominence; but when the ballot is placed in the hands of woman her individuality is enlarged, and she is expected to answer for herself the demands of the law and of society on her individual account, and not as the weaker member of the family to answer by her husband. This naturally draws her out from the dignified and cultivated refinement of her womanly position, and brings her into a closer contact with the rougher elements of society, which tends to destroy that higher reverence and respect which her refinement and dignity in the relation of wife and mother have always inspired in those who approached her in her honorable and useful retirement.

When she becomes a voter she will be more or less of a politician, and will form political alliances or unite with political parties which will frequently be antagonistic to those to which her husband belongs. This will introduce into the family circle new elements of disagreement and discord which will frequently end in unhappy divisions, if not in separation or divorce. This must frequently occur when she becomes an active politician, identified with a party which is distasteful to her husband. On the other hand, if she unites with her husband in party associations and votes with him on all occasions so as not to disturb the harmony and happiness of the family, then the ballot is of no service, as it simply duplicates the vote of the male on each side of the question and leaves the result the same.

Again, if the family is the unit of society, and the state is composed of an aggregation of families, then it is important to society that there be as many happy families as possible, and it becomes the duty of man and woman alike to unite in the holy relations of matrimony.

As this is the only legal and proper mode of rendering obedience to the early command to multiply and replenish the earth, whatever tends to discourage the holy relation of matrimony is in disobedience of this command, and any change which encourages such disobedience is violative of the Divine law, and can not result in advantage to the state. Before forming this relation it is the duty of young men who have to take upon themselves the responsibilities of providing for and protecting the family to select some profession or pursuit that is most congenial to their tastes, and in which they will be most likely to be successful; but this can not be permitted to the young ladies, or if permitted it can not be practically carried out after matrimony.

As it might frequently happen that the young man had selected one profession or pursuit, and the young lady another, the result would be that after marriage she must drop the profession or pursuit of her choice, and employ herself in the sacred duties of wife and mother at home, and in rearing, educating, and elevating the family, while the husband pursues the profession of his choice.

It may be said, however, that there is a class of young ladies who do not choose to marry, and who select professions or avocations and follow them for a livelihood. This is true, but this class, compared with the number who unite in matrimony with the husbands of their choice, is comparatively very small, and it is the duty of society to encourage the increase of marriages rather than of celibacy. If the larger number of females select pursuits or professions which require them to decline marriage, society to that extent is deprived of the advantage resulting from the increase of population by marriage.

It is said by those who have examined the question closely that the largest number of divorces is now found in the communities where the advocates of female suffrage are most numerous, and where the individuality of woman as related to her husband, which such a doctrine inculcates, is increased to the greatest extent.

If this be true, it is a strong plea in the interests of the family and of society against granting the petition of the advocates of woman suffrage.

After all, this is a local question, which properly belongs to the different States of the Union, each acting for itself, and to the Territories of the Union, when not acting in conflict with the laws of the United States.

The fact that a State adopts the rule of female suffrage neither increases nor diminishes its power in the Union, as the number of Representatives in Congress to which each State is entitled and the number of members in the electoral college appointed by each is determined by its aggregate population and not by the proportion of its voting population, so long as no race or class as defined by the Constitution is excluded from the exercise of the right of suffrage.

Now, Mr. President, I shall make no apology for adding to what I have said some extracts from an able and well-written volume, entitled "Letters from the Chimney Corner," written by a highly cultivated lady of Chicago. This gifted lady has discussed the question with so much clearness and force that I can make no mistake by substituting some of the thoughts taken from her book for anything I might add on this question. While discussing the relations of the sexes, and showing that neither sex is of itself a whole, a unit, and that each requires to be supplemented by the other before its true structural integrity can be achieved, she adds:

Now, everywhere throughout nature, to the male and female ideal, certain distinct powers and properties belong. The lines of demarkation are not always clear, not always straight lines; they are frequently wavering, shadowy, and difficult to follow, yet on the whole whatever physical strength, personal aggressiveness, the intellectual scope and vigor which manage vast material enterprises are emphasized, there the masculine ideal is present. On the other hand, wherever refinement, tenderness, delicacy, sprightliness, spiritual acumen, and force, are to the fore, there the feminine ideal is represented, and these terms will be found nearly enough for all practical purposes to represent the differing endowments of actual men and women. Different powers suggest different activities, and under the division of labor here indicated the control of the state, legislation, the power of the ballot, would seem to fall to the share of man. Nor does this decision carry with it any injustice, any robbery of just or natural right to woman.

In her hands is placed a moral and spiritual power far greater than the power of the ballot. In her married or reproductive state the forming and shaping of human souls in their most plastic period is her destiny. Nor do her labors or her responsibilities end with infancy or childhood. Throughout his entire course, from the cradle to the grave, man is ever under the moral and spiritual influence and control of woman. With this power goes a tremendous responsibility for its true management and use. If woman shall ever rise to the full height of her power and privileges in this direction, she will have enough of the world's work upon her hands without attempting legislation.

It may be argued that the possession of civil power confers dignity, and is of itself a re-enforcement of whatever natural power an individual may possess; but the dignity of womanhood, when it is fully understood and appreciated, needs no such re-enforcement, nor are the peculiar needs of woman such as the law can reach.

Whenever laws are needed for the protection of her legal status and rights, there has been found to be little difficulty in obtaining them by means of the votes of men; but the deeper and more vital needs of woman and of society are those which are outside altogether of the pale of the law, and which can only be reached by the moral forces lodged in the hands of woman herself, acting in an enlarged and general capacity.

For instance, whenever a man or woman has been wronged in marriage the law may indeed step in with a divorce, but does that divorce give back to either party the dream of love, the happy home, the prattle of children, and the sweet outlook for future years which were destroyed by that wrong? It is not a legal power which is needed in this case; it is a moral power which shall prevent the wrong, or, if committed, shall induce penitence, forgiveness, a purer life, and the healing of the wound.

This power has been lodged by the Creator in the hands of woman herself, and if she has not been rightly trained to use it there is no redress for her at the hands of the law. The law alone can never compel men to respect the chastity of woman. They must first recognize its value in themselves by living up to the high level of their duties as maidens, wives, and mothers; they must impress men with the beauty and sacredness of purity, and then whatever laws are necessary and available for its protection will be easily obtained, with a certainty, also, that they can be enforced, because the moral sentiments of men will be enlisted in their support.

Privileges bring responsibilities, and before women clamor for more work to do, it were better that they should attend more thoughtfully to the duties which lie all about them, in the home and social circle. Until society is cleansed of the moral foulness which infests it, which, as we have seen, lies beyond the reach of civil law, women have no call to go forth into wider fields, claiming to be therein the rightful and natural purifiers. Let them first make the home sweet and pure, and the streams which flow therefrom will sweeten and purify all the rest.

As between the power of the ballot and this moral force exerted by women there can not be an instant's doubt as to the choice. In natural refinement and elevation of character, the ideal woman stands a step above the ideal man. If she descends from this fortunate position to take part in the coarse scramble for material power, what chance will she have as against man's aggressive forces; and what can she possibly gain that she can not win more directly, more effectually, and with far more dignity and glory to herself by the exercise of her own womanly prerogatives? She has, under God, the formation and rearing of men in her own hands.

If they do not turn out in the end to be men who respect woman, who will protect and defend her in the exercise of every one of her God-given rights, it is because she has failed in her duty toward them; has not been taught to comprehend her own power and to use it to its best ends. For women to seek to control men by the power of suffrage is like David essaying the armor of Saul. What woman needs is her own sheepskin sling and her few smooth pebbles from the bed of the brook, and then let her go forth in the name of the Lord God of Hosts, and a victory as sure and decisive as that of the shepherd of Israel awaits her.

Again, in chapter 4, entitled "The Power of the Home," the author says, in substance: It is, perhaps, of minor consequence that women should have felt themselves emancipated from buttons and bread making; but that they should have learned to look in the least degree slightingly upon the great duties of women as lovers of husbands, as lovers of children, as the fountain and source of what is highest and purest and holiest, and not less of what is homely and comfortable and satisfying in the home, is a serious misfortune. Women can hardly be said to have lost, perhaps what they have so rarely in any age generally attained, that dignity which knows how to command, united with a sweetness which seems all the while to be complying, the power, supple and strong, which rescues the character of the ideal woman from the charge of weakness, and at the same time exhibits its utmost of grace and fascination.

But that of late years the gift has not been cultivated, has not, in fact, thrown out such natural off-shoots as gave grace and glory to some earlier social epochs, must be evident, it would seem, to any thoughtful observer.

If, instead of trying to grasp more material power, women would pursue those studies and investigations which tend to make them familiar with what science teaches concerning the influence of the mother and the home upon the child; of how completely the Creator in giving the genesis of the human race into the hands of woman has made her not only capable of, but responsible for, the regeneration of the world; if they would reflect that nature by making man the bond slave of his passions has put the lever into the hands of woman by which she can control him, and if they would learn to use these powers, not as bad women do for vile and selfish ends, but as the mothers of the race ought, for pure, holy, and redemptive purposes, then would the sphere of women be enlarged to some purpose; the atmosphere of the home would be purified and vitalized, and the work of redeeming man from his vices would be hopefully begun.

The following thoughts are also from the same source: Is this emancipation of woman, if that is the proper phrase for it, a final end, or only the means to an end? Are women to be as the outcome of it emancipated from their world-old sphere of marriage and motherhood, and control of the moral and spiritual destinies of the race, or are they to be emancipated, in order to the proper fulfillment of these functions? It would seem that most of the advanced women of the day would answer the first of these questions affirmatively. Women, I think it has been authoritatively stated, are to be emancipated in order that they may become fully developed human beings, something broader and stronger, something higher and finer, more delicate, more æsthetic, more generally rarefied and sublimated than the old-fashioned type of womanhood, the wife and the mother.

And the result of the woman movement seems more or less in a line thus far with this theoretic aim. Of advanced women a less proportion are inclined to marry than of the old-fashioned type; of those who do marry a great proportion are restless in marriage bonds or seek release from them, while of those who do remain in married life many bear no children, and few, indeed, become mothers of large families. The woman's vitality is concentrated in the brain and fructifies more in intellectual than in physical forms.

Now, women who do not marry are one of two things; either they belong to a class which we shrink from naming or they become old maids.

An old maid may be in herself a very useful and commendable person and a valuable member of society; many are all this. But she has still this sad drawback, she can not perpetuate herself; and since all history and observation go to prove that the great final end of creation, whatever it may be, can only be achieved through the perpetuity and increasing progress of the race, it follows that unmarried woman is not the most necessary, the indispensable type of woman. If there were no other class of females left upon the earth but the women who do not bear children, then the world would be a failure, creation would be nonplussed.

If, then, the movement for the emancipation of woman has for its final end the making of never so fine a quality, never so sublimated a sort of non-child-bearing women, it is an absurdity upon the face of it.

From the standpoint of the Chimney Corner it appears that too many even of the most gifted and liberal-minded of the leaders in the woman's rights movement have not yet discovered this flaw in their logic. They seek to individualize women, not seeing, apparently, that individualized women, old maids, and individualized men, old bachelors, though they may be useful in certain minor ways, are, after all, to speak with the relentlessness of science, fragmentary and abortive, so far as the great scheme of the universe is concerned, and often become, in addition, seriously detrimental to the right progress of society. The man and woman united in marriage form the unit of the race; they alone rightly wield the self-perpetuating power upon which all human progress depends; without which the race itself must perish, the universe become null.

Reaching this point of the argument, it becomes evident that while the development of the individual man or individual woman is no doubt of great importance, since, as Margaret Fuller has justly said, "there must be units before there can be union," it is chiefly so because of their relation to each other. Their character should be developed with a view to their future union with each other, and not to be independent of it. When the leaders of the woman's movement fully realize this, and shape their course accordingly, they will have made a great advance both in the value of their work and its claim upon public sympathy. Moreover, they will have reached a point from which it will be possible for them to investigate reform and idealize the relations existing between men and women.

Mr. President, it is no part of my purpose in any manner whatever to speak disrespectfully of the large number of intelligent ladies, sometimes called strong-minded, who are constantly going before the public, agitating this question of female suffrage. While some of them may, as is frequently charged, be courting notoriety, I have no doubt they are generally earnestly engaged in a work which, in their opinion, would better their condition and would do no injury to society.

In all this, however, I believe they are mistaken.

I think the mental and physical structure of the sexes, of itself, sufficiently demonstrates the fact that the sterner, more laborious, and more difficult duties of society are to be performed by the male sex; while the more delicate duties of life, which require less physical strength, and the proper training of youth, with the proper discharge of domestic duties, belong to the female sex. Nature has so arranged it that the male sex can not attend properly to the duties assigned by the law of nature to the female sex, and that the female sex can not discharge the more rigorous duties required of the male sex.

This movement is an attempt to reverse the very laws of our being, and to drag woman into an arena for which she is not suited, and to devolve upon her onerous duties which the Creator never intended that she should perform.

While the husband discharges the laborious and fatiguing duties of important official positions, and conducts political campaigns, and discharges the duties connected with the ballot-box, or while he bears arms in time of war, or discharges executive or judicial duties, or the duties of juryman, requiring close confinement and many times great mental fatigue; or while the husband in a different sphere of life discharges the laborious duties of the plantation, the workshop, or the machine shop, it devolves upon the wife to attend to the duties connected with home life, to care for infant children, and to train carefully and properly those who in the youthful period are further advanced towards maturity.

The woman with the infant at the breast is in no condition to plow on the farm, labor hard in the workshop, discharge the duties of a juryman, conduct causes as an advocate in court, preside in important cases as a judge, command armies as a general, or bear arms as a private. These duties, and others of like character, belong to the male sex; while the more important duties of home, to which I have already referred, devolve upon the female sex. We can neither reverse the physical nor the moral laws of our nature, and as this movement is an attempt to reverse these laws, and to devolve upon the female sex important and laborious duties for which they are not by nature physically competent, I am not prepared to support this bill.

My opinion is that a very large majority of the American people, yes, a large majority of the female sex, oppose it, and that they act wisely in doing so. I therefore protest against its passage.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I do not feel satisfied when a measure so important to the people of this country and to humanity is about to be submitted to a vote of the Senate to remain wholly silent.

The pending question is upon the adoption of a joint resolution in the usual form submitting to the legislatures of the several States of the Union for their ratification an additional article as an amendment to the Federal Constitution, which is as follows:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article.

Fortunately for the perpetuity of our institutions and the prosperity of the people, the Federal Constitution contains a provision for its own amendment. The framers of that instrument foresaw that time and experience, the growth of the country and the consequent expansion of the Government, would develop the necessity for changes in it, and they therefore wisely provided in Article V as follows:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

Under this provision, at the first session of the First Congress, ten amendments were submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, in due time ratified by the constitutional number of States, and became a part of the Constitution. Since then there have been added to the Constitution by the same process five different articles.

To secure an amendment to the Constitution under this article requires the concurrent action of two-thirds of both branches of Congress and the affirmative action of three-fourths of the States. Of course Congress can refuse to submit a proposed amendment to the Legislatures of the several States, no matter how general the demand for such submission may be, but I am inclined to believe with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], in the proposition submitted by him in a speech he made early in the present session upon the pending resolution, that the question as to whether this resolution shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States for ratification does not involve the right or policy of the proposed amendment.

I am also inclined to believe with him that should the demand by the people for the submission by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States of a proposed amendment become general it would be the duty of the Congress to submit such amendment irrespective of the individual views of the members of Congress, and thus give the people through their Legislative Assemblies power to pass upon the question as to whether or not the Constitution should be amended. At all events, for myself, I should not hesitate to vote to submit for ratification by the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution although opposed to it if I thought the demand for it justified such a course.

But I shall vote for the pending joint resolution because I am in favor of the proposed amendment. I have been for many years convinced that the demand made by women for the right of suffrage is just, and that of all the distinctions which have been made between citizens in the laws which confer or regulate suffrage the distinction of sex is the least defensible.

I am not going to discuss the question at length at this time. The arguments for and against woman suffrage have been often stated in this Chamber, and are pretty fully set forth in the majority and minority reports of the Senate committee upon the pending joint resolution. The arguments in its favorwere fully stated by the senior Senator from New Hampshire in his able speech upon the question before alluded to, and now the objections to it have been forcibly and elaborately presented by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. I could not expect by anything I could say to change a single vote in this body, and the public is already fully informed upon the question, as the arguments in favor of woman suffrage have been voiced in every ham let in the land with great ability. No question in this country has been more ably discussed than this has been by the women themselves.

I do not think a single objection which is made to woman suffrage is tenable. No one will contend but that women have sufficient capacity to vote intelligently.

Sir, sacred and profane history is full of the records of great deeds by women. They have ruled kingdoms, and, my friend from Georgia to the contrary notwithstanding, they have commanded armies. They have excelled in statecraft, they have shone in literature, and, rising superior to their environments and breaking the shackles with which custom and tyranny have bound them, they have stood side by side with men in the fields of the arts and the sciences.

If it were a fact that woman is intellectually inferior to man, which I do not admit, still that would be no reason why she should not be permitted to participate in the formation and control of the Government to which she owes allegiance. If we are to have as a test for the exercise of the right of suffrage a qualification based upon intelligence, let it be applied to women and to men alike. If it be admitted that suffrage is a right, that is the end of controversy; there can no longer be any argument made against woman suffrage, because, if it is her right, then, if there were but one poor woman in all the United States demanding the right of suffrage, it would be tyranny to refuse the demand.

But our friends say that suffrage is not a right; that it is a matter of grace only; that it is a privilege which is conferred upon or withheld from individual members of society by society at pleasure. Society as here used means man's government, and the proposition assumes the fact that men have a right to institute and control governments for themselves and for women. I admit that in the governments of the world, past and present, men as a rule have assumed to be the ruling classes; that they have instituted governments from participation in which they have excluded women; that they have made laws for themselves and for women, and as a rule have themselves administered them; but that the provisions conferring or regulating suffrage in the constitutions and laws of governments so constituted determined the question of the right of suffrage can not be maintained.

Let us suppose, if we can, a community separated from all other communities, having no organized government, owing no allegiance to any existing governments, without any knowledge of the character of present or past governments, so that when they come to form a government for themselves they can do so free from the bias or prejudice of custom or education, composed of an equal number of men and women, having equal property rights to be defined and to be protected by law. When such community came to institute a government—and it would have an undoubted right to institute a government for itself, and the instinct of self-preservation would soon lead them to do so—will my friend from Georgia tell me by what right, human or divine, the male portion of that community could exclude the female portion, although equal in number and having equal property rights with the men, from participation in the formation of such government and in the enactment of laws for the government of the community? I understand the Senator, if he should answer, would say that he believes the Author of our existence, the Ruler of the universe, has given different spheres to man and woman. Admit that; and still neither in nature nor in the revealed will of God do I find anything to lead me to believe that the Creator did not intend that a woman should exercise the right of suffrage.

During the consideration by this body at the last session of the bill to admit Washington Territory into the Union, referring to the fact that in that Territory woman had been enfranchised, I briefly submitted my views on this subject, which I ask the Secretary to read, so that it may be incorporated in my remarks.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. President, there is another matter which I consider pertinent to this discussion, and of too much importance to be left entirely unnoticed on this occasion. It is something new in our political history. It is full of hope for the women of this country and of the world, and full of promise for the future of republican institutions. I refer to the fact that in Washington Territory the right of suffrage has been extended to women of proper age, and that the delegates to the constitutional convention to be held under the provisions of this bill, should it become a law, will, under existing laws of the Territory, be elected by its citizens without distinction as to sex, and the constitution to be submitted to the people will be passed upon in like manner.

I do not intend to discuss the question of woman suffrage upon this occasion, and I refer to it mainly for the purpose of directing attention to the advanced position which the people of this Territory have taken upon this question. I do not believe the proposition so often asserted that suffrage is a political privilege only, and not a natural right. It is regulated by the constitution and laws of a State I grant, but it needs no argument, it appears to me, to show that a constitution and laws adopted and enacted by a fragment of the whole body of the people, but binding alike on all, is a usurpation of the powers of government.

Government is but organized society. Whatever its form, it has its origin in the necessities of mankind and is indispensable for the maintenance of civilized society. It is essential to every government that it should represent the supreme power of the State, and be capable of subjecting the will of its individual citizens to its authority. Such a government can only derive its just powers from the consent of the governed, and can be established only under a fundamental law which is self-imposed. Every citizen of suitable age and discretion who is to be subject to such a government has, in my judgment, a natural right to participate in its formation. It is a significant fact that should Congress pass this bill and authorize the people of Washington Territory to frame a State constitution and organize a State government, the fundamental law of the State will be made by all the citizens of the State to be subject to it, and not by one-half of them. And we shall witness the spectacle of a State government founded in accordance with the principles of equality, and have a State at last with a truly republican form of government.

The fathers of the Republic enunciated the doctrine "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It is strange that any one in this enlightened age should be found to contend that this declaration is true only of men, and that a man is endowed by his Creator with inalienable rights not possessed by a woman. The lamented Lincoln immortalized the expression that ours is a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and yet it is far from that. There can be no government by the people where one-half of them are allowed no voice in its organization and control. I regard the struggle going on in this country and elsewhere for the enfranchisement of women as but a continuation of the great struggle for human liberty which has, from the earliest dawn of authentic history, convulsed nations, rent kingdoms, and drenched battlefields with human blood. I look upon the victories which have been achieved in the cause of woman's enfranchisement in Washington Territory and elsewhere as the crowning victories of all which have been won in the long-continued, still-continuing contest between liberty and oppression, and as destined to exert a greater influence upon the human race than any achieved upon the battlefield in ancient or modern times.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the movement for woman suffrage has passed the stage of ridicule. The pending joint resolution may not pass during this Congress, but the time is not far distant when in every State of the Union and in every Territory women will be admitted to an equal voice in the government, and that will be done whether the Federal Constitution is amended or not. The first convention demanding suffrage for women was held at Seneca Falls, in the State of New York, in 1848. To-day in three of the Territories of the Union women enjoy full suffrage, in a large number of States and Territories they are entitled to vote at school meetings, and in all the States and Territories there is a growing sentiment in favor of this measure which will soon compel respectful consideration by the law-making power.

No measure in this country involving such radical changes in our institutions and fraught with so great consequences to this country and to humanity has made such progress as the movement for woman suffrage. Denunciation will not much longer answer for arguments by the opponents of this measure. The portrayal of the evils to flow from woman suffrage such as we have heard pictured to-day by the Senator from Georgia, the loss of harmony between husband and wife, and the consequent instability of the marriage relation, the neglect of husband and children by wives and mothers for the performance of their political duties, in short the incapacitating of women for wives and mothers and companions, will not much longer serve to frighten the timid. Proof is better than theory. The experiment has been tried and the predicted evils to flow from it have not followed. On the contrary, if we can believe the almost universal testimony, everywhere where it has been tried it has been followed by the most beneficial results.

In Washington Territory, since woman was enfranchised, there have been two elections. At the first there were 8,368 votes cast by women out of a total vote of 34,000 and over. At the second election, which was held in November last, out of 48,000 votes cast in the Territory, 12,000 votes were cast by women. The opponents of female suffrage are silenced there. The Territorial conventions of both parties have resolved in favor of woman suffrage, and there is not a proposition, so far as I know in all that Territory, to repeal the law conferring suffrage upon woman.

I desire also to inform my friend from Georgia that since women were enfranchised in Washington Territory nature has continued in her wonted courses. The sun rises and sets; there is seed-time and harvest; seasons come and go. The population has increased with the usual regularity and rapidity. Marriages have been quite as frequent, and divorces have been no more so. Women have not lost their influence for good upon society, but men have been elevated and refined. If we are to believe the testimony which comes from lawyers, physicians, ministers of the gospel, merchants, mechanics, farmers, and laboring men, the united testimony of the entire people of the Territory, the results of woman suffrage there have been all that could be desired by its friends. Some of the results in that Territory have been seen in making the polls quiet and orderly, in awaking a new interest in educational questions and in questions of moral reform, in securing the passage of beneficial laws and the proper enforcement of them; and, as I have said before, in elevating men, and that without injury to the women.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator can ask me a question, if he chooses.

Mr. EUSTIS. If it be right and proper to confer the right of suffrage on women, I ask the Senator whether he does not think that women ought to be required to serve on juries?

Mr. DOLPH. I can answer that very readily. It does not necessarily follow that because a woman is permitted to vote and thus have a voice in making the laws by which she is to be governed and by which her property rights are to be determined, she must perform such duty as service upon a jury. But I will inform the Senator that in Washington Territory she does serve upon juries, and with great satisfaction to the judges of the courts and to all parties who desire to see an honest and efficient administration of law.

Mr. EUSTIS. I was aware of the fact that women are required to serve on juries in Washington Territory because they are allowed to vote. I understand that under all State laws those duties are considered correlative. Now, I ask the Senator whether he thinks it is a decent spectacle to take a mother away from her nursing infant and lock her up all night to sit on a jury?

Mr. DOLPH. I intended to say before I reached this point of being interrogated that I not only do not believe that there is a single argument against woman suffrage that is tenable, and I may be prejudiced in the matter, but that there is not a single one that is really worthy of any serious consideration. The Senator from Louisiana is a lawyer, and he knows very well that under such circumstances, a mother with a nursing infant, that fact being made known to the court would be excused; that would be a sufficient excuse. He knows himself, and he has seen it done a hundred times, that for trivial excuses compared to that men have been excused from service on a jury.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will ask the Senator whether he knows that under the laws of Washington Territory that is a legal excuse from serving on a jury?

Mr. DOLPH. I am not prepared to state that it is; but there is no question in the world but that any judge, that fact being made known, would excuse a woman from attendance upon a jury. No special authority would be required. I will state further that I have not learned that there has been any serious objection on the part of any woman summoned for jury service in that Territory to perform that duty. I have not learned that it has worked to the disadvantage of any family in the Territory; but I do know that the judges of the courts have taken especial pains to commend the women who have been called to serve upon juries for the manner in which they have discharged their duty.

I wish to say further that there is no connection whatever between jury service and the right of suffrage. The question as to who shall perform jury service, the question as to who shall perform military service, the question as to who shall perform civil official duty in a government is certainly a matter to be regulated by the community itself; but the question of the right to participate in the formation of a government which controls the life and the property and the destinies of its citizens, I contend is a question of right that goes back of these mere regulations for the protection of property and the punishment of offenses under the laws. It is a matter of right which it is tyranny to refuse to any citizen demanding it.

Now, Mr. President, I shall close by saying: God speed the day when not only in all the States of the Union and in all the Territories, but everywhere, woman shall stand before the law freed from the last shackle which has been riveted upon her by tyranny and the last disability which has been imposed upon her by ignorance, not only in respect to the right of suffrage, but in every other respect the peer and equal of her brother, man.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator give way to enable the Chair to lay before the Senate some executive communications?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

NICARAGUA SHIP-CANAL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 21st ultimo, calling for certain correspondence touching the construction of a ship-canal through Nicaragua, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State on the subject, with accompanying papers.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 25, 1887.

NEBRASKA SCHOOL LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in reply to resolution of January 5, 1887, a report of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office as to the grant of school lands by way of indemnity to the State of Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICO LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting supplementary report of the surveyor-general for New Mexico on the private land claim known as the Petaca grant, No. 15; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting supplementary report of the surveyor-general for New Mexico on the private land claim known as Encinas tract, No. 55, José Luis Valdez et al., claimants; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. VEST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REAL ESTATE TITLE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] agrees to indulge me a moment while I make a motion.

The bill (S. 495) changing the name of the Real Estate Title Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was during the last session of Congress referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported adversely, and postponed indefinitely. The friends of the bill desire that that vote be now reconsidered, and that the bill be reinstated on the Calendar and again referred to the committee. I move the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the Senator's desire—not to displace the existing order?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] yielded to me a moment to make this motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to object to the Senator entering a motion to reconsider, but I do not wish the pending order to be displaced, and I object to anything which would have that consequence.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia can do this by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN. I only want this matter referred back to the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I reserve the right to object if any debate arises.

Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to displace the pending order. I simply desire the reconsideration of the vote indefinitely postponing the bill, so that it may be referred back to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill referred to was indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. BROWN. Now I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that motion? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, any measure of legislation which affects popular government based on the will of the people as expressed through their suffrage is not only important but vitally so. If this Government, which is based on the intelligence of the people, shall ever be destroyed it will be by injudicious, immature, or corrupt suffrage. If the ship of state launched by our fathers shall ever be destroyed, it will be by striking the rock of universal, unprepared suffrage. Suffrage once given can never be taken away. Legislatures and conventions may do everything else; they never can do that. When any particular class or portion of the community is once invested with this privilege it is fixed, accomplished, and eternal.

The Senator who last spoke on this question refers to the successful experiment in regard to woman-suffrage in the Territories of Wyoming and Washington. Mr. President, it is not upon the plains of the sparsely-settled Territories of the West that woman suffrage can be tested. Suffrage in the rural districts and sparsely settled regions of this country must from the very nature of things remain pure when corrupt everywhere else. The danger of corrupt suffrage is in the cities, and those masses of population to which civilization tends everywhere in all history. Whilst the country has been pure and patriotic, the cities have been the first cancers to appear upon the body-politic in all ages of the world.

Wyoming Territory! Washington Territory! Where are their large cities? Where are the localities in those Territories where the strain upon popular government must come? The Senator from New Hampshire, who is so conspicuous in this movement, appalled the country some months since by his ghastly array of illiteracy in the Southern States. He proposes that $77,000,000 of the people's money be taken in order to strike down the great foe to republican government, illiteracy. How was that illiteracy brought upon this country? It was by giving the suffrage to unprepared voters. It is not my purpose to go back into the past and make any partisan or sectional appeal, but it is a fact known to every intelligent man that in one single act the right of suffrage was given without preparation to hundreds of thousands of voters who to-day can scarcely read. That Senator proposes now to double, and more than double, that illiteracy. He proposes to give the negro women of the South this right of suffrage, utterly unprepared as they are for it.

In a convention some two years and a half ago in the city of Louisville an intelligent negro from the South said the negro men could not vote the Democratic ticket because the women would not live with them if they did. The negro men go out in the hotels and upon the railroad cars. They go to the cities and by attrition they wear away the prejudice of race; but the women remain at home, and their emotional natures aggregate and compound the race-prejudice, and when suffrage is given them what must be the result?

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to speak of the inconveniences, for they are nothing more, of woman suffrage. I trust that as a gentleman I respect the feelings of the ladies and their advocates. I am not here to ridicule. My purpose only is to use legitimate argument as to a movement which commands respectful consideration, if for no other reason than because it comes from women. But it is impossible to divest ourselves of a certain degree of sentiment when considering this question.

I pity the man who can consider any question affecting the influence of woman with the cold, dry logic of business. What man can, without aversion, turn from the blessed memory of that dear old grandmother, or the gentle words and caressing hand of that blessed mother gone to the unknown world, to face in its stead the idea of a female justice of the peace or township constable? For my part I want when I go to my home—when I turn from the arena where man contends with man for what we call the prizes of this paltry world—I want to go back, not to be received in the masculine embrace of some female ward politician, but to the earnest, loving look and touch of a true woman. I want to go back to the jurisdiction of the wife, the mother; and instead of a lecture upon finance or the tariff, or upon the construction of the Constitution, I want those blessed, loving details of domestic life and domestic love.

I have said I would not speak of the inconveniences to arise from woman suffrage—I care not—whether the mother is called upon to decide as a juryman or jury-woman rights of property or rights of life, whilst her baby is "mewling and puking" in solitary confinement at home. There are other considerations more important, and one of them to my mind is insuperable. I speak now respecting women as a sex. I believe that they are better than men, but I do not believe they are adapted to the political work of this world. I do not believe that the Great Intelligence ever intended them to invade the sphere of work given to men, tearing down and destroying all the best influences for which God has intended them.

The great evil in this country to-day is in emotional suffrage. The great danger to-day is in excitable suffrage. If the voters of this country could think always coolly, and if they could deliberate, if they could go by judgment and not by passion, our institutions would survive forever, eternal as the foundations of the continent itself; but massed together, subject to the excitements of mobs and of these terrible political contests that come upon us from year to year under the autonomy of our Government, what would be the result if suffrage were given to the women of the United States?

Women are essentially emotional. It is no disparagement to them they are so. It is no more insulting to say that women are emotional than to say that they are delicately constructed physically and unfitted to become soldiers or workmen under the sterner, harder pursuits of life.

What we want in this country is to avoid emotional suffrage, and what we need is to put more logic into public affairs and less feeling. There are spheres in which feeling should be paramount. There are kingdoms in which the heart should reign supreme. That kingdom belongs to woman. The realm of sentiment, the realm of love, the realm of the gentler and the holier and kindlier attributes that make the name of wife, mother, and sister next to that of God himself.

I would not, and I say it deliberately, degrade woman by giving her the right of suffrage. I mean the word in its full signification, because I believe that woman as she is to-day, the queen of home and of hearts, is above the political collisions of this world, and should always be kept above them.

Sir, if it be said to us that this is a natural right belonging to women, I deny it. The right of suffrage is one to be determined by expediency and by policy, and given by the State to whom it pleases. It is not a natural right; it is a right that comes from the state.

It is claimed that if the suffrage be given to women it is to protect them. Protect them from whom? The brute that would invade their rights would coerce the suffrage of his wife, or sister, or mother as he would wring from her the hard earnings of her toil to gratify his own beastly appetites and passions.

It is said that the suffrage is to be given to enlarge the sphere of woman's influence. Mr. President, it would destroy her influence. It would take her down from that pedestal where she is to-day, influencing as a mother the minds of her offspring, influencing by her gentle and kindly caress the action of her husband toward the good and pure.

But I rise not to discuss this question, but to discharge a request. I know that when a man attacks this claim for woman suffrage he is sneered at and ridiculed as afraid to meet women in the contests for political honor and supremacy. If so, I oppose to the request of these ladies the arguments of their own sex; but first, I ask the Secretary to read a paper which has been sent to me with a request that I place it before the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, respectfully remonstrate against the further extension of suffrage to women.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, those names sounded very much like the names of men.

Mr. VEST. They are men's names. I did not say that the petition was signed by ladies. I referred to the papers in my hand, which I shall proceed to lay before the Senate.

I hold in my hand an argument against woman suffrage by a lady very well known in the United States, and well known to the Senators from Massachusetts, a lady whose philanthropy, whose exertions in behalf of the oppressed and poor and afflicted have given her a national reputation. I refer to Mrs. Clara T. Leonard, the wife of a distinguished lawyer, and whose words of themselves will command the attention of the public.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

[Letter from Mrs. Clara T. Leonard.]

The following letter was read by Thornton K. Lothrop, esq., at the hearing before the Legislative committee on woman suffrage, January 29, 1884:

The principal reasons assigned for giving suffrage to women are these:

That the right to vote is a natural and inherent right of which women are deprived by the tyranny of men.

That the fact that the majority of women do not wish for the right or privilege to vote is not a reason for depriving the minority of an inborn right.

That women are taxed but not represented, contrary to the principles of free government.

That society would gain by the participation of women in government, because women are purer and more conscientious than men, and especially that the cause of temperance would be promoted by women's votes.

Those women who are averse to female suffrage hold differing opinions on all these points, and are entitled to be heard fairly and without unjust reproach and contempt on the part of "suffragists," so called.

The right to vote is not an inherent right, but, like the right to hold land, is conferred upon individuals by general consent, with certain limitations, and for the general good of all.

It is as true to say that the earth was made for all its inhabitants, and that no man has a right to appropriate a portion of its surface, as to say that all persons have a right to participate in government. Many persons can be found to hold both these opinions. Experience has proved that the general good is promoted by ownership of the soil, with the resultant inducement to its improvement.

Voting is simply a mathematical test of strength. Uncivilized nations strive for mastery by physical combat, thus wasting life and resources. Enlightened societies agree to determine the relative strength of opposing parties by actual count. God has made women weaker than men, incapable of taking part in battles, indisposed to make riot and political disturbance.

The vote which, in the hand of a man, is a "possible bayonet," would not, when thrown by a woman, represent any physical power to enforce her will. If all the women in the State voted in one way, and all the men in the opposite one, the women, even if in the majority, would not carry the day, because the vote would not be an estimate of material strength and the power to enforce the will of the majority. When one considers the strong passions and conflicts excited in elections, it is vain to suppose that the really stronger would yield to the weaker party.

It is no more unjust to deprive women of the ballot than to deprive minors, who outnumber those above the age of majority, and who might well claim, many of them, to be as well able to decide political questions as their elders.

If the majority of women are either not desirous to vote or are strongly opposed to voting, the minority should yield in this, as they are obliged to do in all other public matters. In fact, they will be obliged to yield, so long as the present state of opinion exists among women in general, for legislators will naturally consult the wishes of the women of their own families and neighborhood, and be governed by them. There can be no doubt that in this State, where women are highly respected and have great influence, the ballot would be readily granted to them by men, if they desired it, or generally approved of woman suffrage. Women are taxed, it is true; so are minors, without the ballot; it is untrue, to say that either class is not represented. The thousand ties of relationship and friendship cause the identity of interest between the sexes. What is good in a community for men, is good also for their wives and sisters, daughters and friends. The laws of Massachusetts discriminate much in favor of women, by exempting unmarried women of small estate from taxation; by allowing women, and not men, to acquire a settlement without paying a tax; by compelling husbands to support their wives, but exempting the wife, even when rich, from supporting an indigent husband; by making men liable for debts of wives, and not vice versa. In the days of the American Revolution, the first cause of complaint was, that a whole people were taxed but not represented.

To-day there is not a single interest of woman which is not shared and defended by men, not a subject in which she takes an intelligent interest in which she cannot exert an influence in the community proportional to her character and ability. It is because the men who govern live not in a remote country, with separate interests, but in the closest relations of family and neighborhood, and bound by the tenderest ties to the other sex, who are fully and well represented by relations, friends, and neighbors in every locality. That women are purer and more conscientious than men, as a sex, is exceedingly doubtful when applied to politics. The faults of the sexes are different, according to their constitution and habits of life. Men are more violent and open in their misdeeds, but any person who knows human nature well and has examined it in its various phases knows that each sex is open to its peculiar temptation and sin; that the human heart is weak and prone to evil without distinction of sex.

It seems certain that, were women admitted to vote and to hold political office, all the intrigue, corruption, and selfishness displayed by men in political life would also be found among women. In the temperance cause we should gain little or nothing by admitting women to vote, for two reasons: first, that experience has proved that the strictest laws can not be enforced if a great number of people determine to drink liquor; secondly, because among women voters we should find in our cities thousands of foreign birth who habitually drink beer and spirits daily without intoxication, and who regard license or prohibitory laws as an infringement of their liberty. It has been said that municipal suffrage for women in England has proved a political success. Even if this is true, it offers no parallel to the condition of things in our own cities. First, because there is in England a property qualification required to vote, which excludes the more ignorant and irresponsible classes, and makes women voters few and generally intelligent; secondly, because England is an old, conservative country, with much emigration and but little immigration.

Here is a constant influx of foreigners: illiterate, without love of our country or interest in, or knowledge of, the history of our liberties, to whom, after a short residence, we give a full share in our government. The result begins to be alarming—enormous taxation, purchasable votes, demagogism,—all these alarm the more thoughtful, and we are not yet sure of the end. It is a wise thought that the possible bayonet or ruder weapon in the hands of our new citizens would be even worse than the ballot, and our safer course is to give the immigrants a stake and interest in the government. But when we learn that on an average one thousand immigrants per week landed at the port of Boston in the past calendar year, is it not well to consider carefully how we double, and more than double, the popular vote, with all its dangers and its ingredients of ignorance and irresponsibility. Last of all, it must be considered that the lives of men and women are essentially different.

One sex lives in public, in constant conflict with the world; the other sex must live chiefly in private and domestic life, or the race will be without homes and gradually die out. If nearly one-half of the male voters of our State forego their duty or privilege, as is the fact, what proportion of women would exercise the suffrage? Probably a very small one. The heaviest vote would be in the cities, as now, and the ignorant and unfit women would be the ready prey of the unscrupulous demagogue. Women do not hold a position inferior to men. In this land they have the softer side of life—the best of everything. There are, of course, exceptions—individuals—whose struggle in life is hard, whose husbands and fathers are tyrants instead of protectors; so there are bad wives, and men ruined and disheartened by selfish, idle women.

The best work that a woman can do for the purifying of politics is by her influence over men, by the wise training of her children, by her intelligent, unselfish counsel to husband, brother, or friend, by a thorough knowledge and discussion of the needs of her community. Many laws on the statute-books of our own and other States have been the work of women. More might be added.

It is the opinion of many of us that woman's power is greater without the ballot or possibility of office-holding for gain. When standing outside of politics she discusses great questions upon their merit. Much has been achieved by women in the anti-slavery cause, the temperance cause, the improvement of public and private charities, the reformation of criminals, all by intelligent discussion and influence upon men. Our legislators have been ready to listen to women and carry out their plans when well framed.

Women can do much useful public service upon boards of education, school committees, and public charities, and are beginning to do such work. It is of vital importance to the integrity of our charitable and educational administration that it be kept out of politics. Is it not well that we should have one sex who have no political ends to serve who can fill responsible positions of public trust? Voting alone can easily be exercised by women without rude contact, but to attain any political power women must affiliate themselves with men; because women will differ on public questions, must attend primary meetings and caucuses, will inevitably hold public office and strive for it; in short, women must enter the political arena. This result will be repulsive to a large portion of the sex, and would tend to make women unfeminine and combative, which would be a detriment to society.

It is well that men after the burden and heat of the day should return to homes where the quiet side of life is presented to them. In these peaceful New England homes of ours, great and noble men have been raised by wise and pious mothers, who instructed them, not in politics, but in those general principles of justice, integrity, and unselfishness which belong to and will insure statesmanship in the men who are true to them. Here is the stronghold of the sex, weakest in body, powerful for good or evil over the stronger one, whom women sway and govern, not by the ballot and by greater numbers, but by those gentle influences designed by the Creator to soften and subdue man's ruder nature.

CLARA T. LEONARD.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Missouri has alluded to me in connection with the name of this lady. Perhaps he will allow me to make an additional statement to that which I furnished him, in order that the statement about her may be complete.

All that the Senator from Missouri has said of the character and worth of Mrs. Leonard is true. I do not know her personally. Her husband is my respected personal friend, a lawyer of high standing and character. All that the Senator has said of her ability is proved better than by any other testimony, by the very able and powerful letter which has just been read. But Mrs. Leonard herself is the strongest refutation of her own argument.

Politics, the political arena, political influence, political action in this country consists, I suppose, in two things: one of them the being intrusted with the administration of public affairs, and second, having the vote counted in determining who shall be public servants and what public measures shall prevail in the commonwealth. Now, this lady was intrusted for years with one of the most important public functions ever exercised by any human being in the commonwealth of Massachusetts. We have a board, called the board of lunacy and charity, which controls the large charities for which Massachusetts is famous and in many of which she was the first among civilized communities, for the care of the pauper and the insane and the criminal woman, and the friendless and the poor child. It is one of the most important things, except the education of youth, which Massachusetts does.

A little while ago a political campaign in Massachusetts turned upon a charge which her governor made against the people of the commonwealth in regard to the conduct of the great hospital at Tewksbury, where she was charged by her chief executive magistrate with making sale of human bodies, with cruelty to the poor and defenseless; and not only the whole country, but especially the whole people of Massachusetts, were stirred to the very depths of their souls by that accusation. Mrs. Clara T. Leonard, the writer of this letter, came forward and informed the people that she had been one of the board who had managed that institution for years, that she knew all about it through and through, that the accusation was false and a slander; and before her word and her character the charge of that distinguished governor went down and sunk into merited obscurity and ignominy.

Now, the question is whether the lady who can be intrusted with the charge of one of the most important departments of government, and whose judgment in regard to its character or proper administration is to be taken as gospel by the people where her reputation extends, is not fit to be trusted to have her vote counted when the question is who is to be the next person who is to be trusted with that administration. Mrs. Leonard's mistake is not in misunderstanding the nature either of woman or of man, which she understands perfectly; it is in misunderstanding the nature of politics, that is, the political arena; and this lady has been in the political arena for the last ten years of her life, one of the most important and potent forces therein.

It is true, as she says, that the wife and the mother educate the child and the man, and when the great function of the state, as we hold in our State and as is fast being held everywhere, is also the education of the child and the man, how does it degrade that wife and mother, whose important function it is to do this thing, to utter her voice and have her vote counted in regard to the methods and the policies by which that education shall be conducted?

Why, Mr. President, Mrs. Leonard says in that letter that woman, the wife and the maiden and the daughter, has no political ends to serve. If political ends be to desire office for the greed of gain, if political ends be to get an unjust power over other men, if political ends be to get political office by bribery or by mob violence or by voting through the shutter of a beer-house, that is true; but the persons who are in favor of this measure believe that those very things that Mrs. Leonard holds up as the proper ends in the life of women are political ends and nothing else; that the education of the child, that the preservation of the purity of the home, that the care for the insane and the idiot and the blind and the deaf and the ruined and deserted, are not only political ends but are the chief political ends for which this political body, the state, is created; and those who desire the help of women in the administration of the state desire it because of the ability which could write such a letter as that on the wrong side, and because the qualities of heart and brain which God has given to understand this class of political ends better than He has given it to the masculine heart and brain are needed for their administration.

I have no word of disrespect for Mrs. Leonard, but I say that, in spite of herself and her letter, her life and her character are the most abundant and ample refutation of the belief which she erroneously thinks she entertains. Nobody invites these ladies to a contest of bayonets; nobody who believes that government is a matter of mere physical force asks the co-operation of woman in its administration. It is because government is a conflict of such arguments as that letter states on the one side, because the object of government is the object to which this lady's own life is devoted, that the friends of woman suffrage and of this amendment ask that it shall be adopted.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my great personal respect for the Senator from Massachusetts has given me an interval of enforced silence, and I have only to say that if I should print my desultory remarks I should be compelled to omit his interruption for fear that the amendment would be larger than the original bill. [Laughter.]

I fail to see that anything which has fallen from the distinguished Senator has convicted Mrs. Clara Leonard of inconsistency or has added anything to the argument upon his side of the question. I have never said or intimated that there were women who were not credible witnesses. I have never thought or intimated that there were not women who were competent to administer the affairs of State or even to lead armies. There have been such women, and I believe there will be to the end of time, as there have been effeminate men who have been better adapted to the distaff and the spindle than to the sword or to statesmanship. But these are exceptions in either sex.

If this lady have, as she unquestionably has, the strength of intellect conceded to her by the Senator from Massachusetts and evidenced by her own production, her judgment of woman is worth that of a continent of men. The best judge of any woman is a woman. The poorest judge of any woman is a man. Let any woman with defect or flaw go amongst a community of men and she will be a successful impostor. Let her go amongst a community of women and in one instant the instinct, the atmosphere circumambient, will tell her story.

Mrs. Leonard gives us the result of her opinion and of her experience as to whether this right of suffrage should be conferred upon her own sex. The Senator from Massachusetts speaks of her evidence in a political campaign in Massachusetts and that her unaided and single evidence crushed down the governor of that great State. I thank the Senator for that statement. If Mrs. Leonard had been an office-holder and a voter not a single township would have believed the truth of what she uttered.

Mr. HOAR. She was an office-holder, and the governor tried to put her out.

Mr. VEST. Ah! but what sort of an office-holder? She held the office delegated to her by God himself, a ministering angel to the sick, the afflicted, and the insane. What man in his senses would take from woman this sphere? What man would close to her the charitable institutions and eleemosynary establishments of the country? That is part of her kingdom; that is part of her undisputed sway and realm. Is that the office to which woman suffragists of this country ask us now to admit them? Is it to be the director of a hospital? Is it to the presidency of a board of visitors of an eleemosynary institution? Oh, no; they want to be Presidents, to be Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives, and, God save the mark, ministerial and executive officers, sheriffs, constables, and marshals.

Of course, this lady is found in this board of directors. Where else should a true woman be found? Where else has she always been found but by the fevered brow, the palsied hand, the erring intellect, ay, God bless them, from the cradle to the grave the guide and support of the faltering steps of childhood and the weakening steps of old age!

Oh, no, Mr. President; this will not do. If we are to tear down all the blessed traditions, if we are to desolate our homes and firesides, if we are to unsex our mothers and wives and sisters and turn our blessed temples of domestic peace into ward political-assembly rooms, pass this joint resolution. But for one I thank God that I am so old-fashioned that I would not give one memory of my grandmother or my mother for all the arguments that could be piled, Pelion upon Ossa, in favor of this political monstrosity.

I now propose to read from a pamphlet sent to me by a lady whom I am not able to characterize as a resident of any State, although I believe she resides in the State of Maine. I do not know whether she be wife or mother. She signs this pamphlet as Adeline D. T. Whitney. I have read it twice, and read it to pure and gentle and intellectual women. I say to-day it ought to be in every household in this broad land. It ought to be the domestic gospel of every true, gentle, loving, virtuous woman upon all this continent. There is not one line or syllable in it that is not written in letters of gold. I shall not read it, for my strength does not suffice, nor will the patience of the Senate permit, but from beginning to end it breathes the womanly sentiment which has made pure and great men and gentle and loving women.

I will venture to say, in my great admiration and respect for this woman, whether she be married or single, she ought to be a wife, and ought to be a mother. Such a woman could only have brave and wise men for sons and pure and virtuous women for daughters. Here is her advice to her sex. I am only sorry that every word of it could not be read in the Senate, but I have trespassed too long.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed in your remarks.

Mr. VEST. I shall ask that it be printed. I will undertake, however, to read only a few sentences, not of exceptional superiority to the rest, because every sentence is equal to every other. There is not one impure unintellectual aspiration or thought throughout the whole of it. Would to God that I knew her, that I could thank her on behalf of the society and politics of the United States for this production.

After all—

She says to her own sex—

After all, men work for women; or, if they think they do not, it would leave them but sorry satisfaction to abandon them to such existence as they could arrange without us.

Oh, how true that is; how true!

In blessed homes, or in scattered dissipations of show, amusement, or the worse which these shows and amusements are but terribly akin to, women give purpose to and direct the results of all men's work. If the false standards of living first urge them, until at length the horrible intoxication of the game itself drives them on further and deeper, are we less responsible for the last state of those men than for the first?

Do you say, if good women refused these things and tried for a simpler and truer living, there are plenty of bad ones who would take them anyhow, and supply the motive to deeper and more unmitigated evil? Ah, there come both answer and errand again. Raise the fallen—at least, save the growing womanhood—stop the destruction that rushes accelerating on, before you challenge new difficulty and danger with an indiscriminate franchise. Are not these bad women the very "plenty" that would out-balance you at the polls if you persist in trying the "patch-and-plaster" remedy of suffrage and legislation.

Recognize the fact, the law, that your power, your high commission, is inward, vital, formative and causal. Bring all questions of choice or duty to this test; will it work at the heart of things, among the realities and forces? Try your own life by this; remember that mere external is falsehood and death.

The letter killeth. Give up all that is only of the appearance, or even chiefly so, in conscious delight and motive—in person, surrounding, pursuit. Let your self-presentation, your home-making and adorning, your social effort and interest, your occupation and use of talent, all shape and issue for the things that are essentially and integrally good, and that the world needs to have prevail. Until you can do this, and induce such doing, it is of little use to clamor for mere outward right or to contend that it would be rightly applied.

This whole pamphlet is a magnificent illustration of that stupendous and vital truth that the mission and sphere of woman is in the inward life of man; that she must be the building up and governing power that comes from those better impulses, those inward secrets of the heart and sentiment that govern men to do all that is good and pure and holy and keep them from all that is evil.

Mr. President, the emotions of women govern. What would be the result of woman suffrage if applied to the large cities of this country is a matter of speculation. What women have done in times of turbulence and excitement in large cities in the past we know. Open that terrible page of the French Revolution and the days of terror, when the click of the guillotine and the rush of blood through the streets of Paris demonstrated to what extremities the ferocity of human nature can be driven by political passion. Who led those blood-thirsty mobs? Who shrieked loudest in that hurricane of passion? Woman. Her picture upon the pages of history to-day is indelible. In the city of Paris in those ferocious mobs the controlling agency, nay, not agency, but the controlling and principal power, came from those whom God has intended to be the soft and gentle angels of mercy throughout the world. But I have said more than I intended. I ask that this pamphlet be printed in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection. the pamphlet will be printed in the RECORD as requested by the Senator from Missouri. The Chair hears no objection.

The pamphlet is as follows:

THE LAW OF WOMAN-LIFE.

The external arguments on both sides the modern woman question have been pretty thoroughly presented and well argued. It seems needless to repeat or recombine them; but in one relation they have scarcely been handled with any direct purpose. Justice and expediency have been the points insisted on or contested; these have not gone back far enough; they have not touched the central fact, to set it forth in its force and finality. The fact is original and inherent, behind and at the root of the entire matter, with all its complication and circumstance. We have to ask a question to which it is the answer, and whose answer is that of the whole doubt and dispute.

What is the law of woman-life?

What was she made woman for, and not man?

Shall we look back to that old third chapter of Genesis?

When mankind had taken the knowledge and power of good and evil into their own hands through the mere earthly wisdom of the serpent; when the woman had had her hasty outside way and lead, according to the story, and woe had come of it, what was the sentence? And was it a penance, or a setting right, or a promise, or all three?

The serpent was first dealt with. The narrow policy, the keen cunning, the little, immediate outlook, the expedient motive; all that was impersonated of temporary shift and outward prudence in mortal affairs, regardless of, or blind to, the everlasting issues; all, in short, that represented material and temporal interest as a rule and order—and is not man's external administration upon the earth largely forced to be a legislation upon these principles and economies?—was disposed of with the few words, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman."

Was this punishment—as reflected upon the woman—or the power of a grand retrieval for her? Not to man, who had been led, and who would be led again, by the woman, was the commission of holy revenge intrusted; but henceforth, "I will set the woman against thee." Against the very principle and live prompting of evil, or of mere earthly purpose and motive. "Between thy seed and her seed." Your struggle with her shall be in and for the very life of the race. "It," her life brought forth, "shall bruise thy head," thy whole power, and plan, and insidious cunning; "and thou shalt bruise," shalt sting, torment, hinder, and trouble in the way and daily going, "his heel," his footstep. Thou, the subtle and creeping thing of the ground, shalt lurk after and threaten with crookedness and poison the ways of the men-children in their earth-toiling; the woman, the mother, shall turn upon thee for and in them and shall beat thee down!

Unto the woman He said, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception." The burden and the glory are set in one. The pain of the world shall be in your heart; the trouble, the contradiction of it, shall be against your love and insight. But your pain shall be your power; you shall be the life-bearer; you shall hold the motive; yours shall be the desire, and your husband's the dominion. Therefore shall you bring your aspiration to him, that he may fulfill it for you. "Your desire shall be unto him, and he shall rule."

And unto Adam He said, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife"—yes, and because thou wilt hearken—"thy sorrow shall be in the labor of the earth; the ground shall be cursed;" in all material things shall be cross and trouble, not against you, but "for your sake." "In your sorrow you shall eat of it all the days of your life." Your need and struggle shall be with external things, and with the ruling of them. "For your sake," that you may learn your mastery, inherit your true power, carry out with ease and understanding the desire and need of the race, which woman represents, discerns afar, and pleads to you.

And Adam bowed before the Lord's judgment; we are not told that he answered anything to that; but he turned to his wife, and in that moment "called her name Eve, because she was the mother of all living." Then and there was the division made; and to which, can we say, was the empire given? Both were set in conditions, hemmed in to divine and special work: man, by the stress and sorrow of the ground; woman, by the stress and sorrow of her maternity, and of her spiritual conception, making her truly the "mother of all the living."

At the beginning of human history, or tradition, then, we get the answer to our question: the law of woman-life is central, interior, and from the heart of things; the law of the man's life is circumferential, enfolding, shaping, bearing on and around, outwardly; wheel within wheel is the constitution of human power. It will be an evil day for the world when the nave shall leave its place and contend for that of the felloe. Iron-rimmed for its busy revolution and outward contact is the life and strength of man; but the tempered steel is at the heart and within the soul of the woman, that she may bear the silent pressure of the axle, and quietly and invisibly originate and support the entire onward movement. "The spirit of the living creature is in the wheels," and they can move no otherwise. "When the living creatures went, the wheels went by them; and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up." That was what Ezekiel saw in his vision.

There can be no going forward without a life and presence and impulse at the center; and in the organization of humanity there is where the place and power of woman have been put. For good or for evil, for the serpent or for the redeeming Christ, she must move, must influence, must achieve beforehand, and at the heart; she must be the mother of the race; she must be the mother of the Messiah. Not woman in her own person, but "one born of woman," is the Saviour. For everything that is formed of the Creator, from the unorganized stone to the thought of righteousness in the heart of the race, there must be a matrix; in the creation and in the recreation of His human child God makes woman and the soul of woman His blessed organ and instrument. When woman clears herself of her own perversions, her self-imposed limitations, returns to her spiritual power and place, and cries, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to Thy word," then shall the spirit descend unto her; then shall come the redemption.

Take this for the starting-point; it is the key.

Within, behind, antecedent to all result in action, are the place and office of the woman—by the law of woman-life. And all question of her deed and duty should be brought to this test. Is it of her own, interior, natural relation, putting her at her true advantage, harmonious with the key to which her life is set? I think this suffrage question must settle itself precisely upon this ground-principle, and that all argument should range conclusively around it. Judging so, we should find, I think, that not at the polls, where the last utterance of a people's voice is given—where the results of character, and conscience, and intelligence are shown—is her best and rightful work; on the contrary, that it is useless here, unless first done elsewhere. But where little children learn to think and speak—where men love and listen, and the word is forming—is the office she has to fill, the errand she has to do. The question is, can she do both? Is there need that she should do both? Does not the former and greater include the latter and less?

Hers are indeed the primary meetings: in her nursery, her home, and social circles; with other women, with young men, upon whose tone and character in her maturity her womanhood and motherhood join their beautiful and mighty influence; above all, among young girls—the "little women," to whom the ensign and commission are descending—is her undisputed power. Purify politics? Purify the sewers? But what if, first, the springs, and reservoirs, and conduits could be watched, guarded, filtered, and then the using be made clean and careful all through the homes; a better system devised and carried out for separating, neutralizing, destroying hurtful refuse? Then the poisonous gases might not be creeping back upon us through our enforced economies, our makeshifts and stop-gaps of outside legislation. For legislation is, after all, but cut-off, curb, and patch; an external, troublesome, partial, uncertain application of hindrance and remedy. What physician will work with lotion and plaster when he can touch, and control, and heal at the very seat of the disease?

It is the beginning of the fulfillment that women have waked to the consciousness that they have not as yet filled their full place in human life and affairs. Only has not the mistake been made of contending with and grappling results, when causes were in their hands? Have they not let go the mainsprings to run after and effectually push with pins the refractory cogs upon the wheel-rims?

Woman always deserts herself when she puts her life and motive and influence in mere outsides. Outsides of fashion and place, outsides of charm and apparel, outsides of work and ambition—she must learn that these are not her true showing; she must go back and put herself where God has called her to be with Himself, at the silent, holy inmost; then we shall feel, if not at once, yet surely soon or some time, a new order beginning. He, the Father of all, gives it to us to be the motherhood. That is the great solving and upraising word; not limited to mere parentage, but the law of woman-life. For good or for evil she mothers the world.

Not all are called to motherhood in the literal sense, but all are called to the great, true motherhood in some of its manifold trusts and obligations. "Noblesse oblige;" you can not lay it down. "More are the children of the desolate than of her who hath a husband." All the little children that are born must look to womanhood somewhere for mothering. Do they all get it? All the works and policies of men look back somewhere for a true "desire" toward and by which only they can rule. Is the desire of the woman—of the home, the mother-motive of the world and human living—kept in the integrity and beauty for which it was intrusted to her, that it might move the power of man to noble ends?

Do you ask the governing of the nation? You have the making of the nation. Would you choose your statesmen? First make your statesmen.

Indeed the whole cause on trial may be summarily ended by the proving of an alibi, an elsewhere of demand. Is woman needed at the caucuses, conventions, polls? She is needed, at the same time, elsewhere. Two years of time and strength, of thought and love, from some woman, are essential for every little human being, that he may even begin a life. When you remember that every man is once a little child, born of a woman, trained—or needing training—at a woman's hands; that of the little men, every one of whom takes and shapes his life so, come at length the hand for the helm, the voice for the law, and the arm to enforce law—what do you want more for a woman's opportunity and control?

Which would you choose as a force, an advantage, in settling any question of public moment, or as touching your own private interest through the general management—the right to go upon election day and cast one vote, or a hold beforehand upon the individual ear and attention of each voter now qualified? The ability to present to him your argument, to show him the real point at issue, to convince and persuade him of the right and lasting, instead of the weak and briefly politic way? This initial privilege is in the hands of woman; assuming that she can be brought to feel and act as a unit, which appears to be what is claimed for her in the argument for her regeneration of the outer political word.

But already and separately, if every intelligent, conscientious woman can but reach one man, and influence him from the principle involved—from her interior perception of it, kept pure on purpose from bias and temptation that assail him in the outside mix and jostle—will she not have done her work without the casting of a ballot? And what becomes of "taxation without representation," when, from Eden down, Eve can always plead with Adam, can have the first word instead of the last—if she knows what that first word is, in herself and thence in its power with him—can beguile him to his good instead of to his harm, as indeed she only meant to do in that first ignorant experiment? Would it be any less easy to qualify for and accomplish this than to convince and outnumber in public gathering not only bodies of men but the mass of women that will also have to be confronted and convinced or overborne?

Preconceived opinions, minds made up, men not so easily beguiled to the pure good, you say? Woman quite as apt to make mistakes out of Paradise as in? That only returns us to the primal need and opportunity. Get the man to listen to you before his mind is made up—before his manhood is made up; while it is in the making. That is just the power and place that belong to you, and you must seize and fill. It is your natural right; God gave it to you. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

We can not do all in one day, and in such a day of the world as this. We plant trees for posterity where forests have been laid waste and the beautiful work of life is to be done over again; we can not expect to see our fruit in souls and in the nation at less cost of faith and time. Take care, then, of the little children: the men children, to make men of them; the women children—oh, yes, even above all—to make ready for future mothering—to snatch from the evil that works over against pure womanliness. Until you have done this let men fend for themselves in rough outsides a little longer; except, perhaps, as wise, able women whom the trying transition time calls forth may find fit way and place for effort and protest—there is always room for that, and noble work has been and is being done; but do not rear a new generation of women to expect and desire charges and responsibilities reversive of their own life-law, through whose perfect fulfillment alone may the future clean place be made for all to work in.

Is there excess of female population? Can not all expect the direct rule of a home? Is not this exactly, perhaps, just now, for the more universal remedial mothering that in this age is the thing immediately needed? Let her who has no child seek where she can help the burdened mother of many; how she can best reach with influence, and wisdom, and cherishing, the greatest number—or most efficiently a few—of these dear, helpless, terrible little souls, who are to make, in a few years, a new social condition; a better and higher, happier and safer, or a lower, worse, bitterer, more desperately complicated and distressful one.

"Desire earnestly the best gifts," said Saint Paul, after enumerating the gifts of teaching and prophecy and authority; "and I show you," he goes on, "a yet more excellent way." Charity—not mere alms, or toleration, or general benignity, out of a safe self-provision; but caritas—nearness, and caring, and loving, —the very essence of mothering; the way to and hold of the heart of it all, the heart of the life of humanity. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." That is the first word; it charges womanhood itself, which must be set utterly right before it can take hold to right the world. Here are at once task and mission and rewarding sway.

Woman has got off the track; she must see that first, and replace herself. We are mothering the world still; but we are mothering it, in a fearfully wide measure, all wrong.

Sacrifice is the beginning of all redemption. We must give up. We must even give up the wish and seeming to have a hand in things, that we may work unseen in the elements, and make them fit and healthful; that daily bread and daily life may be sweet again in dear, old, homely ways, and plentiful with all truly blessed opportunities. We are not to organize the world, or to conquer it, or to queen it. We are just to take it again and mother it. If woman would begin that, search out the cradles—of life and character—and take care of the whole world of fifty years hence in taking care of them, calling upon men and the state, when needful, to authorize her action and furnish outward means for it—I wonder what might come, as earnest of good, even in this our day, in which we know not our visitation?

And here again come allowance and exception for what women can always do when this world-mothering forces an appeal to the strength and authority of man. Women have never been prevented from doing their real errands in the world, even outside the domestic boundary. They have defended their husbands' castles in the old chivalrous times, when the male chivalry was away at the crusades. They have headed armies when Heaven called them; only Heaven never called all the women at once; but when the king was crowned, the mission done, they have turned back with desire to their sheltered, gentle, unobtrusive life again. There has no business to be a standing army of women; not even a standing political army. Women have navigated and brought home ships when commanders have died or been stricken helpless upon the ocean; they have done true, intelligent, patient work for science, art, religion; and those have done the most who have never stopped to contend first, whether a woman, as such, may do it or not.

Look at what Dorothea Dix has done, single-handed, single-mouthed, in asylums and before legislatures. Women have sat on thrones, and governed kingdoms well, when that was the station in life to which God called them. If Victoria of England has been anything, she has been the mother of her land; she has been queen and protecting genius of its womanhood and homes. And when a woman does these things, as called of God—not talks of them, as to whether she may make claim to do them—she carries a weight from the very sanctity out of which she steps, as woman, that moves men unlike the moving of any other power. Shall she resign the chance of doing really great things, of meeting grand crises, by making herself common in ward-rooms and at street-corners, and abolishing the perfect idea of home by no longer consecrating herself to it?

If individual woman, as has been said, may gain and influence individual man, and so the man-power in affairs—a body of women, purely as such, with cause, and plea, and reason, can always have the ear and attention of bodies of men; but to do this they must come straight from their home sanctities, as representing them—as able to represent them otherwise than men, because of their hearth-priestesshood; not as politicians, bred and hardened in the public arenas.

That the family is the heart of the state, and that the state is but the widened family, is the fact which the old vestal consecration, power, and honor set forth and kept in mind.

The voice which has of late been so generally conceded to women in town, decisions as regarding public schools, is an instance of the fittingness of relegating to them certain interests of which they should know more than men, because—applying the key-test with which we have started—it has direct relation to and springs from their motherhood. But can one help suggesting that if the movement had been to place women, merely and directly, upon the committees, by votes of men who saw that this work might be in great part best done by them; if women had asked and offered for the place without the jostle of the town-meeting, or putting in that wedge for the ballot—the thing might have been as readily done, and the objection, or political precedent, avoided.

It is not the real opportunity, when that arises or shows itself in the line of her life-law, that is to be refused for woman. It is the taking from internal power to add to external complication of machinery and to the friction of strife. Let us just touch upon some of the current arguments concerning these external impositions which one set is demanding and the other entreating against.

If voting is to be the chief power in woman's hands, or even a power of half the moment that is contended for it, it will grow to be the motive and end, the all-absorbing object, with women that it is with men.

The gubernatorial canvass, the presidential year, these will interrupt and clog all home business, suspend decisions, paralyze plans, as they do with men, or else we shall not be much, as thorough politicians, after all. And if we talk of mending all that, of putting politics in their right place, and governing by pure principle instead of party trick, and stumping and electioneering, we go back in effect to the acknowledgment that only in the interior work, and behind politics, can women do better things at all; which, precisely, was to be demonstrated.

Think, simply, of election day for women.

Would it be so invariably easy a thing for a home-keeper to do, at the one opportunity of the year, or the four years, on a particular day, her duty in this matter? It is easy to say that it takes no more time than a hundred other things that some do; but setting apart all the argument that previous time and strength must have been spent in properly qualifying, how many of the hundred other things are done now without interruption, postponement, hindrance, through domestic contingencies? or are there a hundred other things done when the home contingencies are really met by a woman? A woman's life is not like a man's. That a man's life may be—that he may transact his out-door business; keep his hours and appointments; may cast his vote on election day; may represent wife and children in all wherein the community cares for, or might injure him and them—the woman, some woman, must be at the home post, that the home order may go on, from which he derives that command of time, and freedom from hindering necessities, which leave him to his work. And so, as the old proverb says, while man's work is from sun to sun—made definite, a matter to which he can go forth, and from which he can come in—a woman's work, of keeping the place of the forthgoing and incoming, is never done, from the very nature and ceaseless importance of it.

Must she go to the polls, sick or well, baby or no baby, servant or no servant, strength or no strength, desire or no desire? If she have cook and housemaid they are to go also, and number her two to one, anyway; probably on election day, which they would make a holiday, they would—as at other crises, of birth, sickness, death, house-cleaning, which should occur in no first-class families—come down upon her with their appropriate coup d'état, and "leave;" making the State-stroke, in this instance, of scoring three votes, two dropped and one lost, for the irrepressible side.

How will it be when Norah, and Maggie, and Katie have not only their mass and confession, their Fourth-of-July and Christmas, their mission-weeks, their social engagements and family plans, and their appointments with their dressmakers, to curtail your claims upon their bargained time and service, but their share in the primary meetings and caucuses, committees, and torch-light processions, and mass meetings? For what shall prevent the excitements, the pleasurings, the runnings hither and thither, that men delight in from following in the train of politics and parties with the common woman? Perhaps it may even be discovered, to the still further detriment of our already painfully hampered and perplexed domestic system, that the pursuit of fun, votes, offices, is more remunerative, as well as gentlewomanly—as Micawber might express it—than the cleansing of pots and pans, the weekly wash, or the watching of the roast. Perhaps in that enfranchised day there will be no Katies and Maggies' and the Norahs will know their place no more. Then the enlightened womanhood may have to begin at the foundation and glorify the kitchen again. And good enough for her, in the wide as well as primitive sense of the phrase, and a grand turn in the history that repeats itself toward the old, forgotten, peaceful side of the cycle it may be!

But the argument does not rest upon any such points as these. It rests upon the inside nature of a woman's work; upon the need there is to begin again to-day at the heart of things and make that right; upon the evident fact that this can be done none too soon or earnestly, if the community and the country are not to keep on in the broad way to a threatened destruction; and upon the certainty that it can never be done unless it is done by woman, and with all of woman's might. Not by struggles for new and different place, but by the better, more loving, more intelligent, deep-seeing, and deep-feeling filling of her own place, that none will dispute and none can take from her. We are not where woman was in the old brutal days that are so often quoted; and we shall not, need not, return to that. Christianity has disposed of that sort of argument. We are on a vantage ground for the doing of our real, essential work better than it has been done ever before in the history of the world; and we are madly leaving our work and our vantage together.

The great step made by woman was in the generation preceding this one of restlessness—the restlessness that has come through the first feeling of great power. It was made in the time when women learned physiology, that they might rear and nurse their families and help their neighborhoods understandingly; science, that they might teach and answer little children, and share the joy of knowledge that was spreading swiftly in the earth; political history and economy, that they might listen and talk to their brothers and husbands and sons, and leaven the life of the age as the bread in the mixing; business figures, rules, and principles, that they might sympathize, counsel, help, and prudentially work with and honestly strengthen the bread-winners. The good work was begun in the schools where girls were first told, as George B. Emerson used to tell us Boston girls, that we were learning everything he could teach us, in order to be women: wives, mothers, friends, social influencers, in the best and largest way possible. Women grew strong and capable under such instruction and motive. Are their daughters and grand-daughters about to leap the fence, leave their own realm little cared for—or doomed to be—undertake the whole scheme of outside creation, or contest it with the men? Then God help the men! God save the Commonwealth!

We are past the point already where homes are suffering, or liable to suffer, neglect or injury; they are already left unmade. Shall this go on? Between frivolities and ambitions, between social vanities, and shows, and public meddlings and mixings—for where one woman is needed and doing really brave, true work, there are a hundred rushing forth for the mere sake of rushing—is the primitive home, the power of heaven upon earth to slip away from among us? Let us not build outsides which have no insides, let us not put a face upon things which has no reality behind it. Beware lest we make the confusion that we need the suffrage to help us unmake; lest we tear to pieces that we may patch again. Crazy patchwork that would be, indeed!

Are women's votes required because men will not legislate away evils that they do not heartily wish away? Is government corrupted because men desire shield and opportunity for dishonest speculation; authority and countenance for nefarious combinations? The more need to go to work at the beginning rather than to plunge into the pitch and be defiled; more need to make haste and educate a better generation of men, if it be so we can not, except vi et armis, influence the generation that is. But do you think that if women are in earnest—enough in earnest to give up, as they seem to be to demand—they might not bring their real power to bear even upon these evil things, in their root and inception, and even now? Suppose women would not live in houses, or wear jewels and gowns, that are bought for them out of wicked millions made upon the stock exchange?

Suppose they would stop decorating their dwellings to an agony, crowding them hurriedly with this and that of the last and newest, just because it is last and new, making a show and rivalry of what is not a true-grown beauty of a home at all, but a mere meretriciousness; suppose they would so set to work and change society that displays and feastings, which use up at every separate one a year's comfortable support for a quiet, modest family, should be given up as vulgarities; that people should care for, and be ready for, a true interchange of life and thought, and simple, uncrowded opportunities for these; suppose women would say, "No; I will not blaze at Newport, or run through Europe dropping American eagles or English sovereigns after me like the trail of a comet, or the crumbs that Hop-'o-my-thumb let fall from his pocket that the people at home might track the way he had gone; because if I have money, there is better work to be done with it; and I will not have the money that is made by gambling manipulations and cheats."

Do you think this would have no influence? More than that, and further back, and lowlier down, suppose they should say, every one, "I will not have the new, convenient house, the fresh carpetings, the pretty curtains, or even the least, most fitting freshness, until I know the means are earned for me with honest service to the world, and by no lucky turn of even a small speculation." Further back yet, suppose them to declare, "I will not have the home at all, nor my own happiness, unless it can be based and builded on the kind of life-work that helps to make a real prosperity; that really goes to the building and safe-keeping of a whole nation of such homes." Would there be no power in that? Would it not be a kind of woman-suffrage to settle the very initials of all that ever bears upon the public question? And to bring that sort of woman on the stage, and to the front, is there not enough work to do, and enough "higher education" to insist on and secure?

After all, men work for women; or, if they think they do not, it would leave them but sorry satisfaction to abandon them to such existence as they could arrange without us. In blessed homes, or in scattered dissipations of show, amusement, or the worse which these shows and amusements are but terribly akin to, women give purpose to and direct the results of all men's work. If the false standards of living first urge them, until at length the horrible intoxication of the game itself drives them on further and deeper, are we less responsible for the last state of those men than for the first?

Do you say, if good women refused these things and tried for a simpler and truer living, there are plenty of bad ones who would take them anyhow, and supply the motive to deeper and more unmitigated evil? Ah, there come both answer and errand again. Raise the fallen—at least save the growing womanhood—stop the destruction that rushes accelerating on, before you challenge new difficulty and danger with an indiscriminate franchise. Are not these bad women the very "plenty" that would out-balance you at the polls, if you persist in trying the "patch-and-plaster" remedy of suffrage and legislation?

Recognize the fact, the law, that your power, your high commission, is inward—vital—formative, and casual. Bring all questions of choice or duty to this test, will it work at the heart of things, among the realities and forces? Try your own life by this; remember that mere external is falsehood and death. The letter killeth. Give up all that is only of the appearance—or even chiefly so, in conscious delight and motive—in person, surrounding, pursuit. Let your self-presentation, your home-making and adorning, your social effort and interest, your occupation and use of talent, all shape and issue for the things that are essentially and integrally good, and that the world needs to have prevail. Until you can do this, and induce such doing, it is of little use to clamor for mere outward right, or to contend that it would be rightly applied.

Work as you will, and widely as you can, for schools, in associations, in everything whose end is to teach, enlighten, enlarge women, and so the world. Help and protect the industries of women; but keep those industries within the guiding law of woman-life. Do not throw down barriers that take down safeguards with them; that make threatening breaches in the very social structure. If women must serve in shops, demand and care for it that it shall be in a less mixed, a more shielded way than now. The great caravansaries of trade are perilous by their throng, publicity, and weariness. There used to be women's shops; choice places, where a woman's care and taste had ruled before the counters were spread; where women could quietly purchase things that were sure to be beautiful or of good service; there were not the tumult and ransacking that kill both shop-girl and shopper now.

This is one instance, and but one, of the rescuing that ought to be attempted. There ought at least to be distinct women's departments, presided over by women of good, motherly tone and character, in the places of business which women so frequent, and where the thoughtful are aware of much that makes them tremble. And surely a great many of the girls and women who choose shop-work, because they like its excitement, ought rather to be in homes, rendering womanly service, and preparing to serve in homes of their own—leaving their present places to young men who might perhaps begin so to earn the homes to offer them. Will not this apply all the way up, into the arts and the professions even? There must needs be exceptional women perhaps; there are, and will be, time and errand and place for them; but Heaven forbid that they should all become exceptional.

Once more, work for these things that are behind, and underlie; believing that woman's place is behind and within, not of repression, but of power; and that if she do not fill this place it will be empty; there will be no main spring. Meanwhile she will get her rights as she rises to them, and her defenses where she needs them; everything that helps, defends, uplifts the woman uplifts man and the whole fabric, and man has begun to find it out. If he "will give the suffrage if women want it," as is said, why shall he not as well give them the things that they want suffrage for and that they are capable of representing? Believe me, this work, and the representation which grows out of it, can no longer be done if we attempt the handling of political machinery—the making of platforms, the judging of candidates, the measuring and disputation of party plans and issues, and all the tortuous following up of public and personal political history.

Do you say, men have their individual work in the world, and all this beside and of it, and that therefore we may? Exactly here comes in again the law of the interior. Their work is "of it"—falls in the way. They rub against it as they go along. Men meet each other in the business thoroughfares, at the offices and the street corners; we are in the dear depths of home. We are with the little ones, of whom is not this kingdom, but the kingdom of heaven, which we, through them, may help to come. This is just where we must abandon our work, if we attempt the doing of theirs. And here is where our prestige will desert us, whenever great cause calls us to speak from out our seclusions, and show men, from our insights and our place, the occasion and desire that look unto their rule. They will not listen then; they will remand us to the ballot-box.

"Inside politics" is a good word. That is just where woman ought to be, as she ought to be inside everything, insisting upon and implanting the truth and right that are to conquer. And she can not be inside and outside both. She can not do the mothering and the home-making, the watching and ministry, the earning and maintaining hold and privilege and motive influence behind and through the acts of men—and all the world-wide execution of act beside. Therefore, we say, do not give up the substance which you might seize, for the shadow which you could not hold fast if you were to seem to grasp it. Work on at the foundations. Insist on truth and right; put them into all your own life, taking all the beam out of your own eye before demanding—well, we will say the mote, for generosity's sake, and for the holy authority of the word—out of the brother's eyes.

Establish pure, honest, lovely things—things of good report—in the nurseries, the schools, the social circles where you reign, and the outside world and issue will take form and heed for themselves. The nation, of which the family is the root, will be made, and built, and saved accordingly. Every seed hath its own body. The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent-head of evil, and shall rise triumphant to become the ennobled, recreated commonwealth. Then shall pour forth the double paean that thrills through the glorious final chorus of Schumann's Faust—men and women answering in antiphons—

"The indescribable,
Here it is done;
The ever-womanly
Beckons us on!"

Then shall Mary—the fulfilled, ennobled womanhood—sing her Magnificat; standing to receive from the Lord, and to give the living word to the nations:

"My soul doth magnify the Lord,
And my spirit hath rejoiced in God, my Saviour.
For He hath looked upon the low estate of His handmaiden;
For behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.
For He that is mighty hath done to me great things;
And holy is His name.
And His mercy is unto generations and generations."

The coming new version of the Old Testament gives us, we are told, among other more perfect renderings, this one, which fitly utters charge and promise:

"The Lord gave the word;
Great was the company
Of those
That published it."

"The Lord giveth the word;
And the women that bring Glad tidings
Are a great host."

ADELINE D. T. WHITNEY.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to say but a word. Early in the session I had the opportunity of addressing the Senate upon the general merits of the question. I said then all that I cared to say; but I wish to remind the Senate before the vote is taken that the question to be decided is not whether upon the whole the suffrage should be extended to women, but whether in the proper arena for the amendment of the Constitution ordained by the the Constitution itself one-third of the American people shall have the opportunity to be heard in the discussion of such a proposed amendment—whether they shall have the opportunity of the exercise of the first right of republican government and of the American and of any free citizen, the submission to the popular tribunal, which has alone the power to decide the question whether on the whole, upon a comparison of the arguments pro and con bearing one way and the other upon this great subject, the American people will extend the suffrage to those who are now deprived of it.

That is the real question for the Senate to consider. It is not whether the Senate would, itself, extend the suffrage to women, but whether those men who believe that women should have the suffrage shall be heard, so that there may be a decision and an end made of this great subject, which has now been under discussion more than a quarter of a century, and to-day for the first time even in the legislative body which is to submit the proposition to the country for consideration has there been a prospect of reaching a vote.

I appeal to Senators not to decide this question upon the arguments which have been offered here to-day for or against the merits of the proposition. I appeal to them to decide this question upon that other principle to which I have adverted, whether one-third of the American people shall be permitted to go into the arena of public discussion of the States, among the people of the States, and before the Legislatures of the States, and be heard upon the issue, shall the general Constitution be so amended as to extend this right of suffrage? If, with this opportunity, those who believe in woman suffrage fail, they must be content; for I agree with the Senators upon the opposite side of the Chamber and with all who hold that if the suffrage is to be extended at all, it must be extended by the operation of existing law. I believe it to be an innate right; yet an innate right must be exercised only by the consent of the controling forces of the State. That is all that woman asks. That is all that any one asks who believes in this right belonging to her sex.

As bearing simply upon the question whether there is a demand by a respectable number of people to be heard on this issue, I desire to read one or two documents in my possession. I offer in this connection, in addition to the innumerable petitions which have been placed before the Senate and before the other House, the petition of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. I take it that no Senator will raise the question whether this organization be or be not composed of the very élite of the women of America. At least two hundred thousand of the Christian women of this country are represented in this organization. It is national in its character and scope; it is international, and it exists in every State and in every Territory of the Union. By their officers, Miss Frances E. Willard, the president; Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, recording secretary; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, assistant recording secretary; Miss Esther Pugh, treasurer; Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace, superintendent of department of franchise, and Mrs. Henrietta B. Wall, secretary of department of franchise, they bring this petition to the Senate. It has been indorsed by the action of the body at large. They say:

Believing that governments can be just only when deriving their powers from the consent of the governed, and that in a government professing to be a government of the people, all the people of a mature age should have a voice, and that all class-legislation and unjust discrimination against the rights and privileges of any citizen is fraught with danger to the republic, and inasmuch as the ballot in popular governments is a most potent element in all moral and social reforms:

We, therefore, on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of Christian women engaged in philanthropic effort, pray you to use your influence, and vote for the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the disfranchisement of any citizen on the ground of sex.

I have also just received, in addition to other matter before the Senate, the petition of the Indianapolis Suffrage Association, or of that department of the Women's Christian Temperance Union which has the control of the discussion and management of the operations of the union with reference to the suffrage. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read it. The letter transmitting the petition is as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 12, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have sent the inclosed petitions and arguments to every member on the Committee on Woman Suffrage, hoping if they are read they may have some influence in securing a favorable report for the passage of a sixteenth amendment, giving the ballot to women.

Will you urge upon the members of the committee the importance of their perusal?

Respectfully.

MRS. Z. G. WALLACE,
Sup't Dep't for Franchise of N. W. C. T. U.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR.

I will add in this connection a letter lately received by myself, written by a lady who may not be so distinguished in the annals of the country, yet, at the same time, she has attained to such a position in the society where she lives that she holds the office of postmaster by the sanction of the Government, and has held it for many years. She seems, as other ladies have seemed, to possess the capacity to perform the duties of this governmental office, so far as I know, to universal satisfaction. At all events, it is the truth that no woman, so far as I have ever heard, holding the office of postmaster, and no woman who has ever held the position of clerk under the Government, or who has ever discharged in State or in Nation any executive or administrative function, has as yet been a defaulter, or been guilty of any misconduct or malversation in office, or contributed anything by her own conduct to the disgrace of the appointing or creating official power. This woman says:

NEW LONDON, WIS., January 18, 1887.

Hon. H. W. BLAIR, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Thank you for the address you sent; also for your kindness in remembering us poor mortals who can scarcely get a hearing in such an august body as the Senate of these United States, though I have reason to believe we furnished the men to fill those seats.

There is something supremely ridiculous in the attitude of a man who tells you women are angelic in their nature; that it is his veneration for the high and lofty position they occupy which hopes to keep them forever from the dirty vortex of politics, and then to see him glower at her because she wishes politics were not so dirty, and believes the mother element, by all that makes humanity to her doubly sacred, is just what is needed for its purification.

We have become tired of hearing and reiterating the same old theories and are pleased that you branched out in a new direction, and your argument contains so much which is new and fresh.

We do care for this inestimable boon which one-half the people of this Republic have seized, and are claiming that God gave it to them and are working very zealously to help God keep it for them. (We will remember the Joshua who leads us out of bondage.)

I used to think the Prohibition party would be our Moses, but that has only gone so far as to say, "You boost us upon a high and mighty pedestal, and when we see our way clear to pull you after us we will venture to do so; but you can not expect it while we run any risk of becoming unpopular thereby."

Liberty stands a goddess upon the very dome of our Capitol, Liberty's lamp shines far out into the darkness, a beacon to the oppressed, a dazzling ray of hope to serf and bondsmen of other climes, yet here a sword unforbidden is piercing the heart of the mother whose son believes God has made us to differ so that he can go astray and return. But, alas, he does not return.

Help us to stand upon the same political footing with our brother; this will open both his and our eyes and compel him to stand upon the same moral footing with us. Only this can usher in millenium's dawn.

This letter is signed by Hannah E. Patchin, postmaster at New London, Wis.

As bearing upon the extent of this agitation, I have many other letters of the same character and numerous arguments by women upon this subject, but I can not ask the attention of the Senate to them, for what I most of all want is a vote. I desire a record upon this question. However, I ought to read this letter, which is dated Salina, Kans., December 13, 1886. The writer is Mrs. Laura M. Johns. She is connected with the suffrage movement in that State, and as bearing upon the extent of this movement and as illustrative not only of the condition of the question in Kansas, but very largely throughout the country, perhaps, especially throughout the northern part of the country, I read this and leave others of like character, as they are, because we have not the time:

I am deeply interested in the fate of the now pending resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, conferring upon women the exercise of the suffrage. The right is theirs now.

I see, in speaking to that resolution on December 8 in the Senate, that you refer to Miss Anthony's experiences in the October campaign in Kansas as evidence in part of the growth of interest in this movement, and of sentiment favorable to it, and I am writing now just to tell you about it.

When I planned and arranged for those eleven conventions in eleven fine cities of this State, I thought I knew that the people of Kansas felt a strong interest in the question of woman suffrage; but when with Miss Anthony and others I saw immense audiences of Kansas people receive the gospel of equal suffrage with enthusiasm, saw them sitting uncomfortably crowded, or standing to listen for hours to arguments in favor of suffrage for women; saw the organization of strong and ably officered local, county, and district associations of the best and "brainiest" men and women in our first cities for the perpetuation of woman suffrage teachings; saw people of the highest social, professional, and business position give time, money and influence, to this cause; saw Miss Anthony's life work honored and her fêted and most highly commended, I concluded that I had before known but half of the interest and favorable sentiment in Kansas on this question. These meetings were very largely attended, and by all classes, and by people of all shades of religious and political belief. The representative people of the labor party were there, ministers, lawyers, all professions, and all trades.

No audiences could have been more thoroughly representative of the people; and as we held one (and more) convention in each Congressional district in the State, we certainly had, from the votes of those audiences in eleven cities, a truthful expression of the feeling of the people of the State of Kansas on this question. Many of the friends of the cause here are very willing to risk our fate to the popular vote.

In our conventions Miss Anthony was in the habit of putting the following questions to vote:

"Are you in favor of equal suffrage for women?"

"Do you desire that your Senators, INGALLS and PLUMB, and your seven Congressmen shall vote for the sixteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution?" and

"Do you desire your Legislature to extend municipal suffrage to women?"

In response there always came a rousing "yes," except when the vote was a rising one, and then the house rose in a solid body. Miss Anthony's call for the negative vote was answered by silence.

Petitions for municipal suffrage in Kansas are rolling up enormously. People sign them now who refused to do so last year. I tell you it is catching. Many people here are disgusted with our asking for such a modicum as municipal suffrage, and say they would rather sign a petition asking for the submission of an amendment to our State constitution giving us State suffrage. We have speakers now at work all over the State, their audiences and reception are enthusiastic, and their most radical utterances in favor of woman are the most kindly received and gain them the most applause.

And further to the same effect. I shall offer nothing more of that kind, but I have come in possession of some data bearing upon the question of the intellect of woman. The real objection seems to me to be that she does not know enough to vote; that it is the ignorant ballot that is dangerous; but that is a subject which of course I have no time to go into. However, I have some data collected very recently, and at my request, by a most intelligent gentleman of the State of Maine. Either of the Senators from that State will bear witness as to the high character of this gentleman, Mr. Jordan. He sent the data to me a few days ago. They show the relative standing of the two sexes in the high schools in the State of Maine where they are being educated together, and in one of the colleges of that State:

High school No. 1.—Average rank on scale of 100.—1882: boys 88.7, girls 91; 1883: boys 88.2, girls 91.3; 1884: boys 88.8, girls 91.9 (of the graduating class 7 girls and 1 boy were the eight highest in rank for the four years' course); 1885: boys 88.6, girls 91.4 (eight highest in rank for four years' course, 4 boys and 4 girls); 1886: boys 88.2, girls 91 (eight highest in rank for four years' course, 7 girls and 1 boy).

High school No. 2.—Average rank on scale of 100.—1886: boys 90, girls 93 (six highest in rank for four years' course, 6 girls).

College.—Average rank for fall term of the junior year on the scale of 40.—1882: boys 37.75, girls 37.93; 1883: boys 38.03, girls 38.70; 1884: boys 38.18, girls 38.59; 1885: boys 38.33, girls 38.13.

With only this last exception the average of the girls and young ladies in the high schools and at this institution of liberal training is substantially higher than that of the boys. I simply give that fact in passing, and there leave the matter.

I desire in closing simply to call for the reading of the joint resolution. I could say nothing to quicken the sense of the Senate on the importance of the question about to be taken. It concerns one-half of our countrymen, one-half of the citizens of the United States, but it is more than that, Mr. President. This question is radical, and it concerns the condition of the whole human race. I believe that in the agitation of this question lies the fate of republican government, and in that of republican government lies the fate of mankind. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It has been read. Does the Senator desire to have it read again?

Mr. BLAIR. Has it been read this afternoon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. BLAIR. That is all then. Now, I wish to have printed in the RECORD, by reason of the printed matter that has gone into the RECORD upon the other side, the arguments of Miss Anthony and her associates before the Senate committee, which is out of print as a document. These arguments are very terse and brief. I think it only just that woman, who is most interested, should be heard, at least under the circumstances when she has herself been heard on the other side through printed matter. It will not be burdensome to the RECORD, and I ask that this be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion. The document will be printed in the RECORD.

The document is as follows:

ARGUMENTS BEFORE THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE, UNITED STATES SENATE, MARCH 7, 1884,

By a committee of the Sixteenth Annual Washington Convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association, in favor of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that shall protect the right of women citizens to vote in the several States of the Union.

Order of proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN (Senator COCKRELL). We have allotted the time to be divided as the speakers may desire among themselves. We are now ready to hear the ladies.

Miss SUSAN B. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the select committee: This is the sixteenth time that we have come before Congress in person, and the nineteenth annually by petitions. Ever since the war, from the winter of 1865–'66, we have regularly sent up petitions asking for the national protection of the citizen's right to vote when the citizen happens to be a woman. We are here again for the same purpose. I do not propose to speak now, but to introduce the other speakers, and at the close perhaps will state to the committee the reasons why we come to Congress. The other speakers will give their thought from the standpoint of their respective States. I will first introduce to the committee Mrs. Harriet R. Shattuck, of Boston, Mass.

REMARKS BY MRS. HARRIET R. SHATTUCK.

Mrs. SHATTUCK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: It seems as if it were almost unnecessary for us to come here at this meeting, because I feel that all we have to say and all we have to claim is known to you, and we can not add anything to what has been said in the past sixteen years.

But I should like to say one thing, and that is, that in my work it has seemed that if we could convince everybody of the motives of the suffragists we would go far toward removing prejudices. I know that those motives are very much misunderstood. Persons think of us as ambitious women, who are desirous for fame, and who merely come forward to make speeches and get before the public, or else they think that we are unfortunate beings with no homes, or unhappy wives, who are getting our livelihood in this sort of way. If we could convince every man who has a vote in this Republic that this is not the case, I believe we could go far toward removing the prejudice against us. If we could make them see that we are working here merely because we know that the cause is right, and we feel that we must work for it, that there is a power outside of ourselves which impels us onward, which says to us: go forward and speak to the people and try to bring them up to a sense of their duty and of our right. This is the belief that I have in regard to our position on this question. It is a matter of duty with us, and that is all.

In Massachusetts I represent a very much larger number of women than is supposed. It has always been said that very few women wish to vote. Believing that this objection, although it has nothing to do with the rights of the cause, ought to be met, the association of which I am president inaugurated last year a sort of canvass, which I believe never had been attempted before, whereby we obtained the proportion of women in favor and opposed to suffrage in different localities of our State. We took four localities in the city of Boston, two in smaller cities, and two in the country districts, and one also of school teachers in nine schools of one town. Those school teachers were unanimously in favor of suffrage, and in the nine localities we found that the proportion of women in favor was very large as against those opposed. The total of women canvassed was 814. Those in favor were 405; those opposed, 44; indifferent, 166; refused to sign, 160; not seen, 39. This, you see, is a very large proportion in favor. Those indifferent, and those who were not seen, were not included, because we claim that nobody can yet say that they are opposed or in favor until they declare themselves; but the 405 in favor against the 44 opposed were as 9 to 1. These canvasses were made by women who were of perfect respectability and responsibility, and they swore before a justice of the peace as to the truth of their statements.

So we have in Massachusetts this reliable canvass of the number of women in favor as to those opposed, and we find that it is 9 to 1.

These women, then, are the class whom I represent here, and they are women who can not come here themselves. Very few women in the country can come here and do this work, or do the work in their States, because they are in their homes attending to their duties, but none the less are they believers in this cause. We would not any more than any man in the country ask a woman to leave her home duties to go into this work, but a few of us are so situated that we can do it, and we come here and we go to the State Legislatures representing all the women of the country in this work.

What we ask is, not that we may have the ballot to obtain any particular thing, although we know that better things will come about from it, but merely because it is our right, and as a matter of justice we claim it as human beings and as citizens, and as moral, responsible, and spiritual beings, whose voice ought to be heard in the Government, and who ought to take hand with men and help the world to become better.

Gentlemen, you have kept women just a little step below you. It is only a short step. You shower down favors upon us it is true, still we remain below you, the recipients of favors without the right to take what is our own. We ask that this shall be changed; that you shall take us by the hand and lift us up to the same political level with you, where we shall have rights with you, and stand equal with you before the law.

REMARKS BY MRS. MAY WRIGHT SEWALL.

Miss ANTHONY. I will now introduce to the committee Mrs. May Wright Sewall, of Indianapolis, who is the chairman of our executive committee.

Mrs. SEWALL. Gentlemen of the committee: Gentlemen, I believe, differ somewhat in their political opinions. It will not then be surprising, I suppose, that I should differ somewhat from my friend in regard to the knowledge that you probably possess upon our question. I do not believe that you know all that we know about the women of this country, for I believe that if you did know even all that I know, and my knowledge is much more limited than that of many of my sisters, long ago the sixteenth amendment, for which we ask, would have been passed through your influence.

I remember that when I was here two years ago and had the honor of appearing before the committee, who granted us, on that occasion, what you are so kind and courteous to grant on this occasion, an opportunity to speak before you, I told you that I represented at least seventy thousand women who had asked for the ballot in my State, and I tried then to remind the members of the committee that had seventy thousand Indiana men asked for any measure from the Congress that then occupied this Capitol, that measure would have secured the most deliberate consideration from their hands, and, in all probability, its passage by the Congress. Of that there can be no doubt.

I do not wish to exaggerate my constituency, but during the last two years, and since I had the honor of addressing the committee, the work of woman suffrage has progressed very rapidly in my State. The number of women who have found themselves in circumstances to work openly, and whose spirit has been drawn into it, has largely increased, and as the workers have multiplied the results have increased. While we have not taken the careful canvass that has been so wisely and judiciously taken in Massachusetts, so that I can present to you the exact number of women who would to-day appeal for suffrage, I know that I can, far within the bounds of possible truth, state that while I represented seventy thousand women in my State two years ago, who desired the adoption of the sixteenth amendment, I represent to-day twice that number.

Should any one come up from Indiana, pivotal State as it has been long called in national elections, saying that he represented the wish of one hundred and forty thousand Indiana men, gentlemen, would you scorn his appeal? Would you treat it lightly? Not at all. You know that it would receive the most candid consideration. You know that it would receive not merely respectful consideration, but immediate and prompt and just action upon your part.

I have been told since I have reached Washington that of all women in the country Indiana women have the least to complain of, and the least reason for coming to the United States Capitol with their petitions and the statement of their needs, because we have received from our own Legislature such amendments and amelioration of the old unjust laws. In one sense it is true that we are the recipients in our own State of many civil rights and of a very large degree of civil equality. It is true that as respects property rights, and as respects industrial rights, the women of my own State may perhaps be the envy of all other women in the land, but, gentlemen, you have always told men that the greater their rights and the more numerous their privileges the greater their responsibilities. That is equally true of woman, and simply because our property rights are enlarged, because our industrial field is enlarged, because we have more women who are producers in the industrial world, recognized as such, who own property in their own names, and consequently pay taxes upon that property, and thereby have greater financial and larger social, as well as industrial and business interests at stake in our own commonwealth, and in the manner in which the administration of national affairs is conducted—because of all these privileges we the more need the power which shall emphasize our influence upon political action.

You know that industrial and property rights are in the hands of the lawmakers and the executors of the laws. Therefore, because of our advanced position in that matter, we the more need the recognition of our political equality. I say the recognition of our political equality, because I believe the equality already exists. I believe it waits simply for your recognition; that were the Constitution now justly construed, and the word "citizens," as used in your Constitution, justly applied it would include us, the women of this country. So I ask for the recognition of an equality that we already possess.

Further, because of what we have we ask for more. Because of the duties that we are commanded to do, we ask for more. My friend has said, and it is true in some respects, that men have always kept us just a little below them where they could shower upon us favors, and they have always done that generously. So they have, but, gentlemen, has your sex been more generous in its favors to women than women have been generous toward your sex in their favors? Neither one can do without the other; neither can dispense with the service of the other; neither can dispense with the reverence of the other, with the aid of the other in domestic life, in social life. The men of this nation are rapidly finding that they can not dispense with the service of women in business life. I know that they are also feeling the need of what they call the moral support of women in their public life, and in their political life.

I always feel that it is not for women alone that I appeal. As men have long represented me, or assumed to do so, and as the men of my own family always have done so justly and most chivalrously, I feel that in my appeal for political recognition I represent them; that I represent my husband and my brother and the interest of the sex to which they belong, for you, gentlemen, by lifting the women of the nation into political equality would simply place us where we could lift you where you never yet have stood, upon a moral equality with us. Gentlemen, that is true. You know it as well as I. I do not speak to you as individuals; I speak to you as the representatives of your sex, as I stand here the representative of mine; and never until we are your equals politically will the moral standard for men be what it now is for women, and it is none too high. Let it grow the more elevated by our growth in spirituality, by every aspiration which we receive from the God whence we draw our life and whence we draw our impulses of life. Let our standard remain where it is and be more elevated. Yours must come up to match it, and never will it until we are your equals politically. So it is for men, as well as for women, that I make my appeal.

I know that there are some gentlemen upon this committee who, when we were here two years ago, had something to say about the rights of the States and of their disinclination to interfere with the rights of the States in this matter. I have great sympathy with the gentlemen from the South, who, I hope, do not forget that they are representing the women of the South in their work here at the national capital. Already some Northern States are making rapid strides towards the enfranchisement of their women. The men of some of the Northern States see that they can no longer accomplish the purposes politically which they desire to accomplish without the aid of the women of their respective States. Washington is the third Territory that has added women to its voting force, and consequently to its political power at the national capital as well as its own capital. Oregon will undoubtedly, as her representative will tell you to-day, soon add its women to its voting force. The men who believe that each State must be left to do this for itself will soon find that the balance of power between the North and South is destroyed, unless the women of the South are brought forward to add to the political force of the South as the women of the North are being brought forward to add to the political force of the North.

This should not be acted upon as a partisan measure. We do not appeal to you as Republicans or as Democrats. We have among us Republicans and Democrats; we have our party affiliations. We, of course, were reared with our brothers under the political belief and faith of our fathers, and probably as much influenced by that rearing as our brothers were. We shall go to strengthen both the political parties, neither one nor the other the more, probably. So that it is not as a partisan measure; it is as a just measure, which is our due, not because of what we are, gentlemen, but because of what you are, and because of what we are through you, of what you shall be through us; of what we, men and women, both are by virtue of our heritage and our one Father, our one mother eternal, the spirit created and progressive, that has thus far sustained us, and that will carry us and you forward to the action which we demand of you to take, and to the results which we anticipate will attend upon that action.

REMARKS BY MRS. HELEN M. GOUGAR.

Miss ANTHONY. I think I will call upon the other representative of the State of Indiana to speak now, Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, of Lafayette, Ind.

Mrs. GOUGAR. Gentlemen, we are here on behalf of the women citizens of this Republic, asking for political freedom. I maintain that there is no political question paramount to that of woman suffrage before the people of America to-day. Political parties would fain have us believe that tariff is the great question of the hour. Political parties know better. It is an insult to the intelligence of the present hour to say that when one-half of the citizens of this Republic are denied a direct voice in making the laws under which they shall live, that tariff, or that the civil rights of the negro, or any other question that can be brought up, is equal to the one of giving political freedom to women. So I come to ask you, as representative men, making laws to govern the women the same as the men of this country (and there is not a law that you make in the United States Congress in which woman has not an equal interest with man), to take the word "male" out of the constitutions of the United States and the several States, as you have taken the word "white" out, and give to us women a voice in the laws under which we live.

You ask me why I am inclined to be practical in my view of this question. In the first place, speaking from my own standpoint, I ask you to let me have a voice in the laws under which I shall live because the older empires of the earth are sending in upon our American shores a population drawing very largely from the asylums, yes, from the penitentiaries, the jails, and the poor-houses of the Old World. They are emptying those men upon our shores, and within a few months they are intrusted with the ballot, the law-making power in this Republic, and they and their representatives are seated in official and legislative positions. I, as an American-born woman, to-day enter my protest at being compelled to live under laws made by this class of men very largely, and myself being rendered utterly incapable of the protection that can only come from the ballot. While I would not have you take this right or privilege from those men whom we invite to our shores, I do ask you, in the face of this immense foreign immigration, to enfranchise the tax-paying, intelligent, moral, native-born women of America.

Miss ANTHONY. And foreign women, too.

Mrs. GOUGAR. Miss Anthony suggests an amendment, and I indorse it most heartily, and foreign women too, because if we let a foreign man vote I say let the foreign woman vote. I am in favor of universal suffrage.

Gentlemen, I ask this as a matter of justice; I ask it because it is an insult to the intelligence of the present to draw the sex line upon any right whatever. I know there are many objections urged, and I am sure that you have considered this question; but I only make the demand from the standpoint, not of sex, but of humanity.

As a Northern woman, as a woman from Indiana, I know that we have the intelligent, thinking, cultured, pure, patriotic men and women with us. We have the women who are engaged in philanthropic enterprises. We have in our own State the signatures of over 5,000 of the school teachers asking for woman's ballot. I ask you if the United States Government does not need the voice of those 5,000 educated school teachers as much as it needs the voice of the 240 male criminals who are, on an average, sent out of the penitentiary of Indiana every year, who go to the ballot-box upon every question whatever, and make laws under which those school teachers must live, and under which the mothers of our State must keep their homes and rear their children?

On behalf of the mothers of this country I demand that their hands shall be loosened before the ballot-box, and that they shall have the privilege of throwing the mother heart into the laws that shall follow their sons not only to the age of majority that only has been made legal, but is never recognized, and so I ask you to let the mothers carry their influence in protecting laws around the footsteps of those boys, even after their hair has turned gray and they have seats in the United States Congress. I ask you to give them the power to throw protecting laws around those boys to the very confines of eternity. This can be done in no indirect way; it can not be done by the silent influence; it can not be done by prayer. While I do not underestimate the power of prayer, I say give me my ballot on election day that shall send pure men, good men, intelligent men, statesmen, instead of the modern politician, into our legislative halls. I would rather have that ballot on election day than the prayers of all the disfranchised women in the universe.

So I ask you to loosen our hands. I ask you to let us join with you in developing this science of human government. What is politics after all but the science of government? We are interested in these questions, and we are investigating them already. We have our opinions. Recently an able man has said that we have been grandly developed physically and mentally, but as a nation we are a political infant. So we are, gentlemen; we are to-day in America politically simply an infant. Why is it? It is because we have not recognized God's family plan in government—man and woman together. He created the male and female, and gave them dominion together. We have dominion in every other interest in society, and why shall we not stand shoulder to shoulder and have dominion in the science in government, in making the laws under which we shall live?

We are taxed to support this Government—this immense Capitol building is built largely from the industries of the tax-paying women of this country—and yet we are denied the slightest voice in distributing our taxes. Our foreparents did not object to taxation, but they did object to taxation without representation, and we, as thinking, industrious, active American women, object to taxation without representation. We are willing to contribute our share to the support of this Government, as we always have done, but we have a right to ask for our little yes and no in the form of the ballot so that we shall have a direct influence in distributing the taxes.

Gentlemen, I am amenable to the gallows and the penitentiary, and it is no more than right that I shall have a voice in framing the laws under which I shall be rewarded or punished. Am I asking too much of you as representative men of this great Government when I ask you to let me have a voice in making the laws under which I shall be rewarded or punished? It is written in the law of every State in this Union that a person in the courts shall have a jury of his peers, yet so long as the word "male" stands as it does in the Constitutions of the United States and the States no woman in any State of this Union can have a jury of her peers. I protest in the name of justice against going into the court-room and being compelled to run the gauntlet of the gutter and of the saloon—yes, even of the police court and of the jail—as we are compelled to do to select a male jury to try the interests of women, whether relating to life, property, or reputation. So long as the word "male" is in our constitutions just so long we can not have a jury of our peers in any State in the Union.

I ask that the women shall have the right of the ballot that they may go into our legislative halls and there provide for the prevention rather than the cure of crime. I ask you on behalf of the twelve hundred children under twelve years of age who are in the poor-houses of Indiana, of the sixteen hundred in the poor-houses of Illinois, and on that average in every State in the Union, that you shall take the word "male" out of the constitutions and allow the women of this country to sit in legislative halls and provide homes for and look after the little waifs of society. There are hundreds of moral questions to-day requiring the assistance of the moral element of womanhood to help make the laws under which we shall live.

Gentlemen, the political party that lives in the future must fight the moral battles of humanity. The day of blood is passed; the day of brain and heart is upon us; and I ask you to let the moral constituency that resides in woman's nature be represented. Let me say right here that I do not believe that there is morality in sex, but the social customs have been such that woman has been held to a higher standard. May the day hasten when the social custom shall hold man to as high a moral standard as it to-day holds woman.

This is the condition of things. The political party that presumes to fight the moral battles of the future must have the women in its ranks. We are non-partisan, as has been well said by my friend from Indiana [Mrs. Sewall.] We come Democrats, Republicans, and Greenbackers, and I expect if there were a half dozen other political parties some of us would belong to them. We ask this beneficent action upon your part because we believe that the intelligence and the justice of the hour is demanding it. We do not want a political party action. We want you to keep this question out of the canvass. We ask you in the name of justice and humanity alone, and not on the part of party.

I hold in my hand a petition sent from one district in the State of Illinois with the request that I bear it to you. Out of three hundred electors the names of two hundred stand in this petition that I shall leave in your hands. In this list stand not the wife-whippers, not the drunkards, not the dissolute, but every minister in that town, every editor in that town, every professional man in that town, every banker, and every prominent business man in that town of three hundred electors. I believe that petitions could be rolled up in this way in every town in the Northern and in many of the Southern States. I leave this petition with you for your consideration.

Upon no question whatever has such a large number of petitions been sent as upon this demand for woman suffrage. You have the petitions in your hands, and I ask you in the name of justice and humanity not to let this Congress adjourn without action.

You ask us if we are impatient. Yes; we are impatient. Some of us may die, and I want our grand old standard-bearer, Susan B. Anthony, whose name will go down to history beside that of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Wendell Phillips—I want that woman to go to heaven a free angel from this Republic. The power lies in your hands to make us all free. May the blessing of God be upon the hearts of every one of you, gentlemen; may the scales of prejudice fall from your eyes, and may you, representing the Senate of the United States, have the grand honor of telegraphing to us, to the millions of waiting women from one end of this country to the other, that the sixteenth amendment has been submitted to the ratification of the several legislatures of our States striking the word "male" out of the constitutions; and that this shall be, as we promise it to be, a government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

REMARKS BY MRS. ABIGAIL SCOTT DUNIWAY.

Miss ANTHONY. I now, gentlemen of the committee, introduce to you Mrs. Abigail Scott Duniway, from the extreme Northwest; and before she speaks I wish to say that she has been the one canvasser in the great State of Oregon and Washington Territory, and that it is to Mrs. Duniway that the women of Washington Territory are more indebted than to all other influences for their enfranchisement.

Mrs. DUNIWAY. Gentlemen of the committee, do you think it possible that an agitation like this can go on and on forever without a victory? Do you not see that the golden moment has come for this grand committee to achieve immortality upon the grandest idea that has ever stirred the heart-beats of American citizens, and will you not in the magnanimity of noble purposes rise to meet the situation and accede to our demand, which in your hearts you must know is just?

I do not come before you, gentlemen, with the expectation to instruct you in regard to the laws of our country. The women around us are law-abiding women. They are the mothers, many of them, of true and noble men, the wives, many of them, of grand, free husbands, who are listening, watching, waiting eagerly for successful tidings of this great experiment.

There never was a grander theory of government than that of these United States. Never were grander principles enunciated upon any platform, never so grand before and never can be grander again, than the declaration that "all men," including of course all women, since women are amenable to the laws, "are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights * * * that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Gentlemen, are we allowed the opportunity of consent? These women who are here from Maine to Oregon, from the Straits of Fuca to the reefs of Florida, who in their representative capacity have come up here so often, augmented in their numbers year by year, looking with eyes of hope and hearts of faith, but oftentimes with hopes deferred, upon the final solution of this great problem, which it is so much in your hands to hasten in its solution—these women are in earnest. My State is far away beyond the confines of the Rocky Mountains, away over beside the singing Pacific sea, but the spirit of liberty is among us there, and the public heart has been stirred. The hearts of our men have been moved to listen to our demands, and in Washington Territory, as one speaker has informed you, women to-day are endowed with full and free enfranchisement, and the rejoicing throughout that Territory is universal.

In Oregon men have also listened to our demand, and the Legislature has in two successive sessions agreed upon a proposition to amend our State constitution, a proposition which will be submitted for ratification to our voters at the coming June election. It is simply a proposition declaring that the right of suffrage shall not hereafter be prohibited in the State of Oregon on account of sex. Your action in the Senate of the United States will greatly determine the action of the voters of Oregon on our, or rather on their, election day, for we stand before the public in the anomaly of petitioners upon a great question in which we, in its final decision, are allowed no voice, and we can only stand with expectant hearts and almost bated breath awaiting the action of men who are to make this decision.

We have great hope for our victory, because the men of the broad, free West are grand, and chivalrous, and free. They have gone across the mighty continent with free steps; they have raised the standard of a new Pacific empire; they have imbibed the spirit of liberty with their very breath, and they have listened to us far in advance of many of the men of the older States who have not had their opportunity among the grand free wilds of nature for expansion.

So all of our leaders are with us to-day. You may go to either member of the Senate of the United States from Oregon, and while I can not speak so positively for the senior member, as he came over here some years ago before the public were so well educated as now, I can and do proudly vouch for the late Senator-elect DOLPH, who now has a seat upon the floor of the Senate, who is heart and soul and hand and purse in sympathy with this great movement for the enfranchisement of the women of Oregon. I would also be unjust to our worthy representative in the lower house, Hon. M. C. George, did I not proudly speak his name in this great connection. Men of this class are with us, and without regard to party affiliations we know that they are upon our side. Our governor, our associate supreme judge for the district of the Pacific, all of these men, are leading in the grand free way that characterizes the men of the West in assisting in this work. But we have—alas, that I should be compelled to say it—a great many men who pay no heed whatever to this question. Men will be entitled to a voice in this decision who are not, like members of Congress, the picked men of the nation or the State, but men, many of whom can not read, who will have an opportunity to decide this question as far as their ballots can go. These are they to whom the enlightened, educated motherhood of the State of Oregon must look largely for the decision.

This brings me to the grand point of our coming to Congress. Some of you say to us, "Why not leave this matter for settlement in the different States?" When we leave it for settlement in the different States we leave it just as I have told you, because of the constitutional provisions of our organic law we can not do otherwise; but if the question were to be settled by the Legislature of Oregon alone it would be settled now; and I, as a representative of that State only, would have no need of coming here; it would be settled just as it has been settled in Washington Territory; but when we come here to Congress it is the great nation asking you to take such legislative action in submitting an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as shall recognize the equality of these women who are here; these women who have come here from all parts of the country, whose constituents are looking on while we are here before you. As we reflect that our feeblest words uttered before this committee will go to the confines of this nation and be cabled across the great Atlantic and around the globe, we realize that more and more prominently our cause is growing into public favor, and the time is just upon us when some decision must be made.

Gentlemen of the committee, will you not recognize the importance of the movement? Who among you will be our standard-bearer? Who among you will achieve immortality by standing up in these halls in which we are forbidden to speak, and in the magnanimity of your own free wills and noble hearts champion the woman's cause and make us before the law, as we of right ought now to be, free and independent?

REMARKS BY MRS. CAROLINE GILKEY ROGERS.

Miss ANTHONY. I now call upon Mrs. Caroline Gilkey Rogers, of Lansingburg, N. Y., to address the committee.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in our efforts to secure the right of citizenship we appeal only to your sense of justice and love of fair dealing.

We ask for the ballot because it is the symbol of equality. There is no other recognized symbol of equality in this country. We ask for the ballot that we may be equal to man before the law. We urge a twofold right—our right to the Republic, the Republic's right to us. We believe the interests of the country are identical with the interests of all its citizens, including women, and that the Government can no longer afford to shut women out from the affairs of the State and nation, and wise men are beginning to know that they are needed in the Government; that they are needed where our laws are made as well as where they are violated.

Many admit the justice of our claim, but will say, Is it safe? Is it expedient? It is always safe to do right; is always expedient to be just. Justice can never bring evil in its train.

The question is asked how and what would the women do in the State and nation? We do not pledge ourselves to anything. I claim that we can not have a better government than that of the people. The present Government is of only a part of the people. We have not yet entered upon the system of higher arbitration, because the Government is of man only. If we had been marching along with you all this time I trust we should have reached a higher plane of civilization.

We believe that all the virtue of the world can take care of all the evil, and all the intelligence can take care of all the ignorance. Let us have all the virtue confront all the vice.

There is no need to do battle in this matter. In all kindness and gentleness we urge our claims. There is no need to declare war upon men, for the best of men in this country are with us heart and soul.

It is a common remark that unless some new element is infused into our political life our nation is doomed to destruction. What more fitting element than the noble type of American womanhood, who have taught our Presidents, Senators, and Congressmen the rudiments of all they know.

Think of all the foreigners and all our own native-born ignorant men who can not write their own names or read the Declaration of Independence making laws for such women as Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony. Think of jurors drawn from these ranks to watch and try young girls for crimes often committed against them when the male criminal goes free. Think of a single one of these votes on election day outweighing all the women in the country

Is it not humiliating for me to sit, a political cipher, and see the colored man, in my employ, to whom I have taught the alphabet, go out on election day and say by his vote what shall be done with my tax money. How would you like it?

When we think of the wives trampled on by husbands whom the law has taught them to regard as inferior beings, and of the mothers whose children are torn from their arms by the direct behest of the law at the bidding of a dead or living father, when we think of these things, our hearts ache with pity and indignation.

If mothers could only realize how the laws which they have no voice in making and no power to change affect them at every point, how they enter every door, whether palace or hovel, touch, limit, and bind, every article and inmate from the smallest child up, no woman, however shrinking and delicate, can escape it, they would get beyond the meaningless cry, "I have all the rights I want." Do these women know that in most States in the Union the shameful fact that no woman has any legal rights to her own child, except it is born out of wedlock! In these States there is not a line of positive law to protect the mother; the father is the legal protector and guardian of the children.

Under the laws of most of the States to-day a husband may by his last will bequeath his child away from its mother, so that she might, if the guardian chose, never see it again.

The husband may have been a very bad man, and in a moment of anger made the will. The guardian he has appointed may turn out a malicious man, and take pleasure in tormenting the mother, or he may bring up the children in a way that the mother thinks ruinous to them, and she has no redress in law. Why do not all the fortunate mothers in the land cry out against such a law? Why do not all women say, "Inasmuch as the law has done this wrong unto the least of these my sisters it has done it unto me." It is true that men are almost always better than their laws, but while a bad law remains on the statute-books it gives to an unscrupulous man a right to be as bad as the law.

It is often said to us when all the women ask for the ballot it will be granted. Did all the married women petition the Legislatures of their States to secure to them the right to hold in their own name the property that belonged to them? To secure to the poor forsaken wife the right to her earnings?

All the women did not ask for these rights, but all accepted them with joy and gladness when they were obtained, and so it will be with the franchise. But woman's right to self-government does not depend upon the numbers that demand it, but upon precisely the same principles that man claims it for himself.

Where did man get the authority that he now claims to govern one-half of humanity, from what power the right to place woman, his helpmeet in life, in an inferior position? Came it from nature? Nature made woman his superior when she made her his mother—his equal when she fitted her to hold the sacred position of wife. Did women meet in council and voluntarily give up all their claim to be their own law-makers?

The power of t e strong over the weak makes man the master. Yes, then, and then only, does he gain the authority.

It is all very well to say "convert the women." While we most heartily wish they could all feel as we do, yet when it comes to the decision of this great question they are mere ciphers, for if this question is settled by the States it will be left to the voters, not to the women to decide. Or if suffrage comes to women through a sixteenth amendment of the national Constitution, it will be decided by Legislatures elected by men. In neither case will women have an opportunity of passing upon the question. So reason tells us we must devote our best efforts to converting those to whom we must look for the removal of our disabilities, which now prevent our exercising the right of suffrage.

The arguments in favor of the enfranchisement of women are truths strong and unanswerable, and as old as the free institutions of our Government. The principle of "taxation without representation is tyranny" applies to women as well as men, and is as true to-day as it was a hundred years ago.

Our demand for the ballot is the great onward step of the century, and not, as some claim, the idiosyncracies of a few unbalanced minds.

Every argument that has been urged against this question of woman's suffrage has been urged against every reform. Yet the reforms have fought their way onward and become a part of the glorious history of humanity.

So it will be with suffrage. "You can stop the crowing of the cock, but you can not stop the dawn of the morning." And now, gentlemen, you are responsible, not for the laws you find on the statute books, but for those you leave there.

REMARKS BY MRS. MARY SEYMOUR HOWELL.

Miss ANTHONY. I now introduce to the committee Mrs. Mary Seymour Howell, the president of the Albany, N. Y., State society.

Mrs. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: Miss Anthony gives me five minutes. I shall have to talk very rapidly. I ask you for the ballot because of the very first principle that is often repeated to you, that "taxation without representation is tyranny." I come from the city of Albany, where many of my sisters are taxed for millions of dollars. There are three or four women in the city of Albany who are worth their millions, and yet they have no voice in the laws that govern and control them. One of our great State senators has said that you can not argue five minutes against woman suffrage without repudiating every principle that this great Republic is founded upon.

I ask you also for the ballot for the large class of women who are not taxed. They need it more than the women who are taxed. I have found in every work that I have conducted that because I am a woman I am not paid for that work as a man is paid for similar work.

You have heard, and perhaps some of you are thinking—I hope not—that women should be at home. I wish to say to you that there are millions of women in the United States who have no homes. There are millions of women who are trying to earn their bread and hold their purity sacred. For that class of women I appeal to you. In the city of Albany there are hundreds of women in our factories making the shirts that you can buy for $1.50 and $2, and all those women are paid for making the shirts is 4 cents apiece. There are in the State of New York 18,000 teachers. When I was a teacher and taught with gentlemen in our academies, I received about one-fourth of the pay because I happened to be a woman. I consider it an insult that forever burns in my soul, that I am to be handed a mere pittance in comparison with what man receives for same quality of work. When I was sent out by our superintendent of public instruction to hold conventions of teachers, as I have often done in our State of New York, and when I did one-third more work than the men teachers so sent out, but because I was a woman and had not the ballot, I was only paid about half as much as the man; and saying that once to our superintendent of public instruction in Albany, he said, "Mrs. Howell, just as soon as you get the ballot and have a political influence in the work you will have the same pay as a man."

We ask for the ballot for that great army of fallen women who walk our streets and who break up our homes and ruin our husbands and our dear boys. We ask it for those women. The ballot will lift them up. Hundreds and thousands of women give up their purity for the sake of starving children and families. There is many a woman who goes to a life of degradation and pollution shedding burning tears over her 4-cent shirts.

We ask for the ballot for the good of the race. Huxley says, "admitting for the sake of argument that woman is the weaker, mentally and physically, for that reason she should have the ballot and should have every help that the world can give her." When you debar from your councils and legislative halls the purity, the spirituality, and the love of woman then those legislative halls and those councils are apt to become coarse and brutal. God gave us to you to help you in this little journey to a better land, and by our love and our intellect to help to make our country pure and noble, and if you would have statesmen you must have stateswomen to bear them.

I ask you also for the ballot that I may decide what I am. I stand before you, but I do not know to-day whether I am legally a "person" according to the law. It has been decided in some States that we are not "persons." In the State of New York, in one village, it was decided that women are not inhabitants. So I should like to know whether I am a person, whether I am an inhabitant, and above all I ask you for the ballot that I may become a citizen of this great Republic.

Gentlemen, you see before you this great convention of women from the Atlantic slopes to the Pacific Ocean, from the North to the South. We are in dead earnest. A reform never goes backward. This is a question that is before the American nation. Will you do your duty and give us our liberty, or will you leave it for braver hearts to do what must be done? For, like our forefathers, we will ask until we have gained it.

Ever the world goes round and round;
Ever the truth comes uppermost; and ever is justice done.

REMARKS BY MRS. LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE.

Miss ANTHONY. I now have the pleasure of introducing to the committee Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake, of New York. New York is a great State, and therefore it has three representatives here to-day.

Mrs. BLAKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: A recent writer in an English magazine, in speaking of the great advantage which to-day flows to the laboring classes of that nation from having received the right of suffrage, made the statement that disfranchised classes are oppressed, not because there is any desire whatever to do injustice to them, but because they are forgotten. We have year after year and session after session of our legislatures and of our Congresses proved the correctness of this statement. While we have nothing to complain of in the courtesy which we receive in private life, still when we see masses of men assembled together for political action, whether it be of the nation or of the State, we find that the women are totally forgotten.

In the limited time that is mine I can not go into any lengthy exposition upon this point. I will simply call your attention to the total forgetfulness of the Congress of the United States to the debt owed to the women of this nation during the war. You have passed a pension bill upon which there has been much comment throughout the nation, and yet, when an old army nurse applies for a pension, a woman who is broken down by her devotion to the nation in hospitals and upon the battle-field, she is met at the door of the Pension Bureau by this statement, "the Government has made no appropriation for the services of women in the war." One of these women is an old nurse whom some of you may remember, Mother Bickerdyke, who went out onto many a battle-field when she was in the prime of life, twenty years ago, and at the risk of her life lifted men, who were wounded, in her arms, and carried them to a place of safety. She is an old woman now, and where is she? What reward has the nation bestowed to her faithful services? The nation has a pension for every man who has served this nation, even down to the boy recruit who was out but three months; but Mother Bickerdyke, though her health has never been good since her service then, is earning her living at the wash-tub, a monument to the ingratitude of a Republic as great as was that when Belisarius begged in the streets of Rome.

I bring up this illustration alone out of innumerable others that are possible, to try to impress upon your minds that we are forgotten. It is not from any unkindness on your part. Who would think for one moment, looking upon the kindly faces of this committee, that any man on it would do an injustice to women, especially if she were old and feeble? But because we have no right to vote, as I said, our interests are overlooked and forgotten.

It is often said that we have too many voters; that the aggregate of vice and ignorance among us should not be increased by giving women the right of suffrage. I wish to remind you of the fact that in the enormous immigration that pours to our shores every year, numbering somewhere in the neighborhood of half a million, there come twice as many men as women. The figures for the last year were two hundred and twenty-three thousand men, and one hundred and thirteen thousand women.

What does this mean? It means a steady influx of this foreign element; it means a constant preponderance of the masculine over the feminine; and it means also, of course, a preponderance of the voting power of the foreigner as compared to the native born. To those who fear that our American institutions are threatened by this gigantic inroad of foreigners I commend the reflection that the best safeguard against any such preponderance of foreign nations or of foreign influence is to put the ballot in the hands of the American-born women, and of all other women also, so that if the foreign-born man overbalances us in numbers we shall be always in a preponderance on the side of the liberty which is secured by our institutions.

It is because, as many of my predecessors have said, of the different elements represented by the two sexes, that we are asking for this liberty. When I was recently in the capitol of my own State of New York, I was reminded there of the difference of temperament between the sexes by seeing how children act when coming to the doors of the capitol, which have been constructed so that they are very hard to open. Whether that is because they want to keep us women out or not I am not able to say; but for some reason the doors are so constructed that it is nearly impossible to open them. I saw a number of little girls coming in through those doors—every child held the door for those who were to follow. A number of little boys followed just after, and every boy rushed through and let the door shut in the face of the one who was coming behind him. That is a good illustration of the different qualities of the sexes. Those boys were not unkind, they simply represented that onward push which is one of the grandest characteristics of your sex; and the little girls, on the other hand, represented that gentleness and thoughtfulness of others which is eminently a characteristic of women.

This woman element is needed in every branch of the Government. Look at the wholesale destruction of the forests throughout our nation, which has gone on until it brings direct destruction to the land on the lines of the great rivers of the West, and threatens us even in New York with destroying at once the beauty and usefulness of our far-famed Hudson. If women were in the Government do you not think they would protect the economic interests of the nation? They are the born and trained economists of the world, and when you call them to your assistance you will find an element that has not heretofore been felt with the weight which it deserves.

As we walk through the Capitol we are struck with the significance of the symbolism on every side; we view the adornments in the beautiful room, and we find here everywhere emblematically woman's figure. Here is woman representing even war, and there are women representing grace and loveliness and the fullness of the harvest; and, above all, they are extending their protecting arms over the little children. Gentlemen, I leave you under this symbolism, hoping that you will see in it the type of a coming day when we shall have women and men united together in the national councils in this great building.

REMARKS BY DR. CLEMENCE S. LOZIER.

Miss ANTHONY. I meant to have said, as I introduced Mrs. Blake, that sitting on the sofa is Dr. Clemence S. Lozier, who declines to speak, but I want her to stand up, because she represents New York city.

Dr. LOZIER. I thank you. I am very happy to be here, but I am not a fluent speaker. I feel in my heart that I know what justice means; that I know what mercy means, and in all my rounds of duty in my profession I am happy to extend not only food but shelter to many poor ones. The need of the ballot for working-girls and those who pay no taxes is not understood. The Saviour said, seeing the poor widow cast her two mites, which make a farthing, into the public treasury, "This poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury." I see this among the poor working-girls of the city of New York; sick, in a little garret bedroom, perhaps, and although needing medical care and needing food, they will say to me, "above all things else, if I could only pay the rent." The rent of their little rooms goes into the coffers of their landlords and pays taxes. The poor women of the city of New York and everywhere are the grandest upholders of this Government. I believe they pay indirectly more taxes than the monopoly kings of our country. It is for them that I want the ballot.

REMARKS BY MRS. ELIZABETH BOYNTON HARBERT.

Miss ANTHONY. I now introduce to the committee Mrs. Elizabeth Boynton Harbert, of Illinois, and before Mrs. Harbert speaks I wish to say that for the last six years she has edited a department of the Chicago Inter-Ocean called the "Women's Kingdom."

Mrs. HARBERT. Mr. Chairman and honorable gentlemen of the committee, after the eloquent rhetoric to which you have listened I merely come in these five minutes with a plain statement of facts. Some friends have said, "Here is the same company of women that year after year besiege you with their petitions." We are here to-day in a representative capacity. From the great State of Illinois I come, representing 200,000 men and women of that State who have recorded their written petitions for woman's ballot, 90,000 of these being citizens under the law—male voters; those 90,000 having signed petitions for the right of women to vote on the temperance question; 90,000 women also signed those petitions; 50,000 men and women signed the petitions for the school vote, and nearly 60,000 more have signed petitions that the right of suffrage might be accorded to woman.

This growth of public sentiment has been occasioned by the needs of the children and the working-women of that great State. I come here to ask you to make a niche in the statesmanship and legislation of the nation for the domestic interests of the people. You recognize that the masculine thought is more often turned to the material and political interests of the nation. I claim that the mother thought, the woman element needed, is to supplement the concurrent statesmanship of American men on political and industrial affairs with the domestic legislation of the nation.

There are good men and women who believe that women should use their influence merely through their social sphere. I believe both of the great parties are represented by us. You remember that a few weeks ago when there came across the country the news of the decision of the Supreme Court as regards the negro race the politicians sprang to the platform, and our editors hastened to their sanctums, to proclaim to the people that that did not interfere with the civil rights of the negro; that only their social rights were affected, and that the civil rights of man, those rights worth dying for, were not affected. Gentlemen, we who are trying to help the men in our municipal governments, who are trying to save the children from our poor-houses, begin to realize that whatever is good and essential for the liberty of the black man is good for the white woman and for all women. We are here to claim that whatever liberty has done for you it should be allowed to do for us. Take a single glance through the past; recognize the position of American manhood before the world to-day, and whatever liberty has done for you, liberty will surely do for the mothers of the race.

MRS. SARAH E. WALL.

Miss ANTHONY. Gentlemen of the committee, here is another woman I wish to show you, Sarah E. Wall, of Worcester, Mass., who, for the last twenty-five years, has resisted the tax-gatherer when he came around. I want you to look at her. She looks very harmless, but she will not pay a dollar of tax. She says when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will give her the right of representation she will pay her taxes. I do not know exactly how it is now, but the assessor has left her name off the tax-list, and passed her by rather than have a lawsuit with her.

REMARKS BY MISS SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

Miss ANTHONY. I wish I could state the avocations and professions of the various women who have spoken in our convention during the last three days. I do not wish to speak disparagingly in regard to the men in Congress, but I doubt if a man on the floor of either House could have made a better speech than some of those which have been made by women during this convention. Twenty-six States and Territories are represented with live women, traveling all the way from Kansas, Arkansas, Oregon, and Washington Territory. It does seem to me that after all these years of coming up to this Capitol an impression should be made upon the minds of legislators that we are never to be silenced until we gain the demand. We have never had in the whole thirty years of our agitation so many States represented in any convention as we have had this year.

This fact shows the growth of public sentiment. Mrs. Duniway is here all the way from Oregon, and you say, when Mrs. Duniway is doing so well up there, and is so hopeful of carrying the State of Oregon, why do not you all rest satisfied with that plan of gaining the suffrage? My answer is that I do not wish to see the women of the thirty-eight States of this Union compelled to leave their homes and canvass each State, school district by school district. It is asking too much of a moneyless class of people, disfranchised by the constitution of every State in the Union. The joint earnings of the marriage copartnership in all the States belong legally to the husband. If the wife goes outside the home to work, the law in most of the States permits her to own and control the money thus earned. We have not a single State in the Union where the wife's earnings inside the marriage copartnership are owned by her. Therefore, to ask the vast majority of women who are thus situated, without an independent dollar of their own, to make a canvass of the States is asking to much.

Mrs. GOUGAR. Why did they not ask the negro to do that?

Miss ANTHONY. Of course the negro was not asked to go begging the white man from school district to school district to get his ballot. If it was known that we could be driven to the ballot-box like a flock of sheep, and all vote for one party, there would be a bid made for us; but that is not done, because we can not promise you any such thing; because we stand before you and honestly tell you that the women of this nation are educated equally with the men, and that they, too, have political opinions. There is not a woman on our platform, there is scarcely a woman in this city of Washington, whether the wife of a Senator or a Congressman—I do not believe you can find a score of women in the whole nation—who have not opinions on the pending Presidential election. We all have opinions; we all have parties. Some of us like one party and one candidate and some another.

Therefore we can not promise you that women will vote as a unit when they are enfranchised. Suppose the Democrats shall put a woman-suffrage plank in their platform in their Presidential convention, and nominate an open and avowed friend of woman suffrage to stand upon that platform; we can not pledge you that all the women of this nation will work for the success of that party, nor can I pledge you that they will all vote for the Republican party if it should be the one to take the lead in their enfranchisement. Our women will not toe a mark anywhere; they will think and act for themselves, and when they are enfranchised they will divide upon all political questions, as do intelligent, educated men.

I have tried the experiment of canvassing four States prior to Oregon, and in each State with the best canvass that it was possible for us to make we obtained a vote of one-third. One man out of every three men voted for the enfranchisement of the women of their households, while two voted against it. But we are proud to say that our splendid minority is always composed of the very best men of the State, and I think Senator PALMER will agree with me that the forty thousand men of Michigan who voted for the enfranchisement of the women of his State were really the picked men in intelligence, in culture, in morals, in standing, and in every direction.

It is too much to say that the majority of the voters in any State are superior, educated, and capable, or that they investigate every question thoroughly, and cast the ballot thereon intelligently. We all know that the majority of the voters of any State are not of that stamp. The vast masses of the people, the laboring classes, have all they can do in their struggle to get food and shelter for their families. They have very little time or opportunity to study great questions of constitutional law.

Because of this impossibility for women to canvass the States over and over to educate the rank and file of the voters we come to you to ask you to make it possible for the Legislatures of the thirty-eight States to settle the question, where we shall have a few representative men assembled before whom we can make our appeals and arguments.

This method of settling the question by the Legislatures is just as much in the line of States' rights as is that of the popular vote. The one question before you is, will you insist that a majority of the individual voters of every State must be converted before its women shall have the right to vote, or will you allow the matter to be settled by the representative men in the Legislatures of the several States? You need not fear that we shall get suffrage too quickly if Congress shall submit the proposition, for even then we shall have a hard time in going from Legislature to Legislature to secure the two-thirds votes of three-fourths of the States necessary to ratify the amendment. It may take twenty years after Congress has taken the initiative step to make action by the State Legislatures possible.

I pray you, gentlemen, that you will make your report to the Senate speedily. I know you are ready to make a favorable one. Some of our speakers may not have known this as well as I. I ask you to make a report and to bring it to a discussion and a vote on the floor of the Senate.

You ask me if we want to press this question to a vote provided there is not a majority to carry it. I say yes, because we want the reflex influence of the discussion and of the opinions of Senators to go back into the States to help us to educate the people of the States.

Senator LAPHAM. It would require a two-thirds vote in both the House and the Senate to submit the amendment to the State Legislatures for ratification.

Miss ANTHONY. I know that it requires a two-thirds vote of both Houses. But still, I repeat, even if you can not get the two-thirds vote, we ask you to report the bill and bring it to a discussion and a vote at the earliest day possible. We feel that this question should be brought before Congress at every session. We ask this little attention from Congressmen whose salaries are paid from the taxes; women do their share for the support of this great Government. We think we are entitled to two or three days of each session of Congress in both the Senate and House. Therefore I ask of you to help us to a discussion in the Senate this session. There is no reason why the Senate, composed of seventy-six of the most intelligent and liberty-loving men of the nation, shall not pass the resolution by a two-thirds vote. I really believe it will do so if the friends on this committee and on the floor of the Senate will champion the measure as earnestly as if it were to benefit themselves instead of their mothers and sisters.

Gentlemen, I thank you for this hearing granted, and I hope the telegraph wires will soon tell us that your report is presented, and that a discussion is inaugurated on the floor of the Senate.

ARGUMENTS OF THE WOMAN-SUFFRAGE DELEGATES BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, JANUARY 23, 1880.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Friday, January 23, 1880.

The committee assembled at half-past 10 o'clock a. m.

Present: Mr. Thurman, chairman; Mr. McDonald, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Davis, of Illinois; Mr. Edmunds.

Also Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace, of Indiana; Mrs. Elizabeth L. Saxon, of Louisiana; Mrs. Mary A. Stewart, of Delaware; Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler, of Pennsylvania; Mrs. Julia Smith Parker, of Glastonbury, Conn.; Mrs. Nancy R. Allen, of Iowa; Miss Susan B. Anthony, of New York; Mrs. Sara A. Spencer, of the city of Washington, and others, delegates to the twelfth Washington convention of the National Woman-Suffrage Association, held January 21 and 22, 1880.

The CHAIRMAN. Several members of the committee are unable to be here. Mr. Lamar is detained at his home in Mississippi by sickness; Mr. Carpenter is confined to his room by sickness; Mr. Conkling has been unwell; I do not know how he is this morning; and Mr. Garland is chairman of the Committee on Territories, which has a meeting this morning that he could not omit to attend. I do not think we are likely to have any more members of the committee than are here now, and we will hear you, ladies.

REMARKS BY MRS. ZERELDA G. WALLACE, OF INDIANA.

Mrs. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is scarcely necessary to recite that there is not an effect without a cause. Therefore it would be well for the statesmen of this nation to ask themselves the question, what has brought the women from all parts of this nation to the capital at this time; the wives and mothers, and sisters; the home-loving, law-abiding women? What has been the strong motive that has taken us away from the quiet and comfort of our own homes and brought us before you to-day? As an answer partly to that question, I will read an extract from a speech made by one of Indiana's statesmen, and probably if I tell you his name his sentiments may have some weight with you. He found out by experience and gave us the benefit of his experience, and it is what we are rapidly learning:

"You can go to meetings; you can vote resolutions; you can attend great demonstrations on the street; but, after all, the only occasion where the American citizen expresses his acts, his opinion, and his power is at the ballot-box; and that little ballot that he drops in there is the written sentiment of the times, and it is the power that he has as a citizen of this great Republic."

That is the reason why we are here; that is the reason why we want to vote. We are no seditious women, clamoring for any peculiar rights, but we are patient women. It is not the woman question that brings us before you to-day; it is the human question that underlies this movement among the women of this nation; it is for God, and home, and native land. We love and appreciate our country; we value the institutions of our country. We realize that we owe great obligations to the men of this nation for what they have done. We realize that to their strength we owe the subjugation of all the material forces of the universe which give us comfort and luxury in our homes. We realize that to their brains we owe the machinery that gives us leisure for intellectual culture and achievement. We realize that it is to their education we owe the opening of our colleges and the establishment of our public schools, which give us these great and glorious privileges.

This movement is the legitimate result of this development, of this enlightenment, and of the suffering that woman has undergone in the ages past. We find ourselves hedged in at every effort we make as mothers for the amelioration of society, as philanthropists, as Christians.

A short time ago I went before the Legislature of Indiana with a petition signed by 25,000 women, the best women in the State. I appeal to the memory of Judge McDonald to substantiate the truth of what I say. Judge McDonald knows that I am a home-loving, law-abiding, tax-paying woman of Indiana, and have been for 50 years. When I went before our Legislature and found that 100 of the vilest men in our State, merely by the possession of the ballot, had more influence with the law-makers of our land than the wives and mothers of the nation, it was a revelation that was perfectly startling.

You must admit that in popular government the ballot is the most potent means of all moral and social reforms. As members of society, as those who are deeply interested in the promotion of good morals, of virtue, and of the proper protection of men from the consequences of their own vices, and of the protection of women, too, we are deeply interested in all the social problems with which you have grappled so long unsuccessfully. We do not intend to depreciate your efforts, but you have attempted to do an impossible thing. You have attempted to represent the whole by one-half; and we come to you to-day for a recognition of the fact that humanity is not a unit; that it is a unity; and because we are one-half that go to make up that grand unity we come before you to-day and ask you to recognize our rights as citizens of this Republic.

We know that many of us lay ourselves liable to contumely and ridicule. We have to meet sneers; but we are determined that in the defense of right we will ignore everything but what we feel to be our duty.

We do not come here as agitators, or aimless, dissatisfied, unhappy women by any means; but we come as human beings, recognizing our responsibility to God for the advantages that have come to us in the development of the ages. We wish to discharge that responsibility faithfully, effectually, and conscientiously, and we can not do it under our form of government, hedged in as we are by the lack of a power which is such a mighty engine in our form of government for every means of work.

I say to you, then, we come as one-half of the great whole. There is an essential difference in the sexes. Mr. Parkman labored very hard to prove what no one would deny—that there is an essential difference in the sexes, and it is because of that very differentiation, the union of which in home, the recognition of which in society, brings the greatest happiness, the recognition of which in the church brings the greatest power and influence for good, and the recognition of which in the Government would enable us finally, as near as it is possible for humanity, to perfect our form of government. Probably we can never have a perfect form of government, but the nearer we approximate to the divine the nearer will we attain to perfection; and the divine government recognizes neither caste, class, sex, nor nationality. The nearer we approach to that divine ideal the nearer we will come to realizing our hopes of finally securing at least the most perfect form of human government that it is possible for us to secure.

I do not wish to trespass upon your time, but I have felt that this movement is not understood by a great majority of people. They think that we are unhappy, that we are dissatisfied, that we are restive. That is not the case. When we look over the statistics of our State and find that 60 per cent. of all the crime is the result of drunkenness; when we find that 60 per cent. of the orphan children that fill our pauper homes are the children of drunken parents; when we find that after a certain age the daughters of those fathers who were made paupers and drunkards by the approbation and sanction and under the seal of the Government, go to supply our houses of prostitution, and when we find that the sons of these fathers go to fill up our jails and our penitentiaries, and that the sober, law-abiding men, the pains-taking, economical, and many of them widowed wives of this nation have to pay taxes and bear the expenses incurred by such legislation, do you wonder, gentlemen, that we at least want to try our hand and see what we can do?

We may not be able to bring about that Utopian form of government which we all desire, but we can at least make an effort. Under our form of government the ballot is our right; it is just and proper. When you debate about the expediency of any matter you have no right to say that it is inexpedient to do right. Do right and leave the result to God. You will have to decide between one of two things: either you have no claim under our form of Constitution for the privileges which you enjoy, or you will have to say that we are neither citizens nor persons.

Realizing this fact, and the deep interest that we take in the successful issue of this experiment that humanity is making for self-government, and realizing the fact that the ballot never can be given to us under more favorable circumstances, and believing that here on this continent is to be wrought out the great problem of man's ability to govern himself—and when I say man I use the word in the generic sense—that humanity here is to work out the great problems of self-government and development, and recognizing, as I said a few minutes ago, that we are one-half of the great whole, we feel that we ought to be heard when we come before you and make the plea that we make to-day.

REMARKS BY MRS. JULIA SMITH PARKER, OF GLASTONBURY, CONN.

Mrs. PARKER. Gentlemen: You may be surprised, and not so much surprised as I am, to see a woman of over four-score years of age appear before you at this time. She came into the world and reached years of maturity and discretion before any person in this room was born. She now comes before you to plead that she can vote and have all the privileges that men have. She has suffered so much individually that she thought when she was young she had no right to speak before the men; but still she had courage to get an education equal to that of any man at the college, and she had to suffer a great deal on that account. She went to New Haven to school, and it was noised that she had studied the languages. It was such an astonishing thing for girls at that time to have the advantages of education that I had absolutely to go to cotillon parties to let people see that I had common sense. [Laughter.]

She has suffered; she had to pay money. She has had to pay $200 a year in taxes without the least privilege of knowing what becomes of it. She does not know but that it goes to support grog-shops. She knows nothing about it. She has had to suffer her cows to be sold at the sign-post six times. She suffered her meadow land to be sold, worth $2,000, for a tax of less than $50. If she could vote as the men do she would not have suffered this insult; and so much would not have been said against her as has been said if men did not have the whole power. I was told that they had the power to take any thing that I owned if I would not exert myself to pay the money. I felt that I ought to have some little voice in determining what should be done with what I paid. I felt that I ought to own my own property; that it ought not to be in these men's hands; and I now come to plead that I may have the same privileges before the law that men have. I have seen what a difference there is, when I have had my cows sold, by having a voter to take my part.

I have come from an obscure town (I can not say that it is obscure exactly) on the banks of the Connecticut, where I was born. I was brought up on a farm. I never had an idea that it could be possible that I should ever come all the way to Washington to speak before those who had not come into existence when I was born. Now, I plead that there may be a sixteenth amendment, and that women may be allowed the privilege of owning their own property. That is what I have taken pains to accomplish. I have suffered so much myself that I felt it might have some effect to plead before this honorable committee. I thank you, gentlemen, for hearing me so kindly.

REMARKS BY MRS. ELIZABETH L. SAXON, OF LOUISIANA.

Mrs. SAXON. Gentleman, I almost feel that after Mrs. Wallace's plea there is scarcely a necessity for me to say anything; she echoed my own feelings so entirely. I come from the extreme South, she from the West. In this delegation, and in the convention which has just been held in this city, women have come together who never met before. People have asked me why I came.

I care nothing for suffrage so far as to stand beside men, or rush to the polls, or take any privilege outside of my home, only, as Mrs. Wallace says, for humanity. Years ago, when a little child, I lost my mother, and I was brought up by a man. If I have not a man's brain I had at least a man's instruction. He taught me that to work in the cause of reform for women was just as great as to work in the cause of reform for men. But in every effort I made in the cause of reform I was combated in one direction or another. I never took part with the suffragists. I never realized the importance of their cause until we were beaten back on every side in the work of reform. If we attempted to put women in charge of prisons, believing that wherever woman sins and suffers women should be there to teach, help, and guide, every place was in the hands of men. If we made an effort to get women on the school boards we were combated and could do nothing. Every place seemed to be changed, when there were good men in those places, by changes of politics; and the mothers of the land, having had to prostrate themselves as beggars, if not in fact, really in sentiment and feeling, have become at last almost desperate.

In the State of Texas I had a niece living whose father was an inmate of a lunatic asylum. She exerted as wide an influence in the State of Texas as any woman there. I allude to Miss Mollie Moore, who was the ward of Mr. Cushing. I give this illustration as a reason why Southern women are taking part in this movement. Mr. Wallace had charge of that lunatic asylum for years. He was a good, honorable, able man. Every one was endeared to him; every one appreciated him; the State appreciated him as superintendent of this asylum.

When a political change was made and Governor Robinson came in, Dr. Wallace was ousted for political purposes. It almost broke the hearts of some of the women who had sons, daughters, or husbands there. They determined at once to try to seek some redress and have him reinstated. It was impossible. He was out, and what could we do? I do not know that we could reach a case like that; but such cases have stirred the women of the whole land, for the reason that when they try to do good, or want to help in the cause of humanity, they are combated so bitterly and persistently.

I leave it to older and abler women, who have labored in this cause so long, to prove whether it is or is not constitutional to give the ballot to women.

A gentleman said to me a few days ago, "These women want to marry." I am married; I am a mother; and in our home the sons and brothers are all standing like a wall of steel at my back. I have cast aside every prejudice of the past. They lie like rotted hulks behind me.

After the fever of 1878, when our constitutional convention was going to convene, I broke the agony and grief of my own heart, for one of my children died, and took part in the suffrage movement in Louisiana, with the wife of Chief-Justice Merrick, Mrs. Sarah A. Dorsey, and Mrs. Harriet Keatinge, of New York, the niece of Mr. Lozier. These three ladies aided me faithfully and ably. When they found we would be received, I went before the convention. I went to Lieutenant-Governor Wiltz, and asked him if he would present or consider a petition which I wished to bring before the convention. He read the petition. One clause of our State law is that no woman can sign a will. We will have that question decided before the meeting of the next Legislature. Some ladies donated property to an asylum. They wrote the will and signed it themselves, and it was null and void, because the signers were women. They not knowing the law, believed that they were human beings, and signed it. That clause, perhaps, will be wiped out. Many gentlemen signed the petition on that account. I took the paper around myself. Governor Wiltz, then lieutenant-governor, told me he would present the petition. He was elected president of the convention. I presented my first petition, signed by the best names in the city of New Orleans and in the State.

I had the names of seven of the most prominent physicians there, leading with the name of Dr. Logan, and many men, seeing the name of Dr. Samuel Logan, also signed it. I went to all the different physicians and ministers. Three prominent ministers signed it for moral purposes alone. When Mrs. Dorsey was on her dying bed the last time she ever signed her name was to a letter to go before that convention. No one believed she would die. Mrs. Merrick and myself went before the convention. I was invited before the committee on the judiciary. I made an impression favorable enough there to be invited before the convention with these ladies. I addressed the convention. We made the petition then that we make here; that we, the mothers of the land, are barred on every side in the cause of reform. I have strived hard in the work of reform for women. I pledged my father on his dying bed that I would never cease that work until woman stood with man equal before the law, so far as my efforts could accomplish it. Finding myself baffled in that work, I could only take the course which we have adopted, and urge the proposition of the sixteenth amendment.

I beg of you, gentlemen, to consider this question apart from the manner in which it was formerly considered. We, as the women of the nation, as the mothers, as the wives, have a right to be heard, it seems to me, before the nation. We represent precisely the position of the colonies when they plead, and, in the words of Patrick Henry, they were "spurned with contempt from the foot of the throne." We have been jeered and laughed at and ridiculed; but this question has passed out of the region of ridicule.

The moral force inheres in woman and in man alike, and unless we use all the moral power of the Government we certainly can not exist as a Government.

We talk of centralization, we talk of division; we have the seeds of decay in our Government, and unless right soon we use the moral force and bring it forward in all its strength and bearing, we certainly cannot exist as a happy nation. We do not exist as a happy nation now. This clamor for woman's suffrage, for woman's rights, for equal representation, is extending all over the land.

I plead because my work has been combatted in the cause of reform everywhere that I have tried to accomplish anything. The children that fill the houses of prostitution are not of foreign blood and race. They come from sweet American homes, and for every woman that went down some mother's heart broke. I plead by the power of the ballot to be allowed to help reform women and benefit mankind.

REMARKS OF MRS. MARY A. STEWART, OF DELAWARE.

Mrs. STEWART. I come from a small State, but one that is represented in this Congress, I consider, by some of the ablest men in the land. Our State, though small, has heretofore possessed and to-day possesses brains. Our sons have no more right to brains than our daughters, yet we are tied down by every chain that could bind the Georgian slave before the war. Aye, we are worse slaves, because the Georgian slave could go to the sale block and there be sold. The woman of Delaware must submit to her chains, as there is no sale for her; she is of no account.

Woman from all time has occupied the highest positions in the world. She is just as competent to-day as she was hundreds of years ago. We are taxed without representation; there is no mistake about that. The colonies screamed that to England; Parliament screamed back, "Be still; long live the king, and we will help you." Did the colonies submit? They did not. Will the women of this country submit? They will not. Mark me, we are the sisters of those fighting Revolutionary men; we are the daughters of the fathers who sang back to England that they would not submit. Then, if the same blood courses in our veins that courses in yours, dare you expect us to submit?

The white men of this country have thrown out upon us, the women, a race inferior, you must admit, to your daughters, and yet that race has the ballot, and why? He has a right to it; he earned and paid for it with his blood. Whose blood paid for yours? Not your blood; it was the blood of your forefathers; and were they not our forefathers? Does a man earn a hundred thousand dollars and lie down and die, saying, "It is all my boys'?" Not a bit of it. He dies saying, "Let my children, be they cripples, be they idiots, be they boys, or be they girls, inherit all my property alike." Then let us inherit the sweet boon of the ballot alike.

When our fathers were driving the great ship of state we were willing to ride as deck or cabin passengers, just as we felt disposed; we had nothing to say; but to-day the boys are about to run the ship aground, and it is high time that the mothers should be asking, "What do you mean to do?" It is high time that the mothers should be demanding what they should long since have had.

In our own little State the laws have been very much modified in regard to women. My father was the first man to blot out the old English law allowing the eldest son the right of inheritance to the real estate. He took the first step, and like all those who take first steps in improvement and reform he received a mountain of curses from the oldest male heirs; but it did not matter to him.

Since 1868 I have, by my own individual efforts, by the use of hard-earned money, gone to our Legislature time after time and have had this law and that law passed for the benefit of the women; and the same little ship of state has sailed on. To-day our men are just as well satisfied with the laws of our State for the benefit of women in force as they were years ago. In our State a woman has a right to make a will. In our State she can hold bonds and mortgages as her own. In our State she has a right to her own property. She can not sell it, though, if it is real estate, simply because the moment she marries her husband has a life-time right. The woman does not grumble at that; but still when he dies owning real estate, she gets only the rental value of one-third, which is called the widow's dower. Now I think the man ought to have the rental value of one-third of the woman's maiden property or real estate, and it ought to be called the widower's dower. It would be just as fair for one as for the other. All that I want is equality.

The women of our State, as I said before, are taxed without representation. The tax-gatherer comes every year and demands taxes. For twenty years have I paid tax under protest, and if I live twenty years longer I shall pay it under protest every time. The tax-gatherer came to my place not long since. "Well," said I, "good morning, sir." Said he, "Good morning." He smiled and said, "I have come bothering you." Said I, "I know your face well. You have come to get a right nice little woman's tongue-lashing." Said he, "I suppose so, but if you will just pay your tax I will leave." I paid the tax, "But," said I, "remember I pay it under protest, and if I ever pay another tax I intend to have the protest written and make the tax-gatherer sign it before I pay the tax, and if he will not sign that protest then I shall not pay the tax, and there will be a fight at once." Said he, "Why do you keep all the time protesting against paying this small tax?" Said I, "Why do you pay your tax?" "Well," said he, "I would not pay it if I did not vote." Said I, "That is the very reason why I do not want to pay it. I can not vote and I do not want to pay it." Now the women have no right when election day comes around. Who stay at home from the election? The women and the black and white men who have been to the whipping-post. Nice company to put your wives and daughters in.

It is said that the women do not want to vote. Here is an array of women. Every woman sitting here wants to vote, and must we be debarred the privilege of voting because some luxurious woman, rolling around in her carriage and pair in her little downy nest that some good, benevolent man has provided for her, does not want to vote?

There was a society that existed up in the State of New York called the Covenanters that never voted. A man who belonged to that sect or society, a man whiter-haired than any of you, said to me, "I never voted. I never intended to vote. I never felt that I could conscientiously support a Government that had its Constitution blotted and blackened with the word 'slave,' and I never did vote until after the abolition of slavery." Now, were all you men disfranchised because that class or sect up in New York would not vote? Did you all pay your taxes and stay at home and refrain from voting because the Covenanters did not vote? Not a bit of it. You went to the election and told them to stay at home if they wanted to, but that you, as citizens, were going to take care of yourselves. That was right. We, as citizens, want to take care of ourselves.

One more thought and I will be through. The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments give the right of suffrage to women, so far as I know, although you learned men perhaps see a little differently. I see through the glass dimly; you may see through it after it is polished up. The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, in my opinion, and in the opinion of a great many smart men in the country, and smart women, too, give the right to women to vote without any "ifs" or "ands" about it, and the United States protects us in it; but there are a few who construe the law to suit themselves, and say that those amendments do not mean that, because the Congress that passed the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments did not mean to do that. Well, the Congress that passed them were mean enough for anything if they did not mean to do that. Let the wise Congress of to-day take the eighth chapter and the fourth verse of the Psalms, which says, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?" and amend it by adding, "What is woman, that they never thought of her?"

REMARKS BY MRS. LUCINDA B. CHANDLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mrs. CHANDLER. Gentlemen, it will be conceded that the progress of civilization, all that lifts humanity above a groveling, sensual, depraved state, is marked by the position, intelligence, and culture of women. Perhaps you think that American women have no rightful claim to present; but American women and mothers do claim that they should have the power to protect their children, not only at the hearthstone, but to supervise their education. It is neither presuming nor unwomanly for the mothers and women of the land to claim that they are competent and best fitted, and that it rightfully belongs to them to take part in the management and control of the schools, and the instruction, both intellectual and moral, of their children, and that in penal, eleemosynary, or reformatory institutions women should have positions as inspectors of prisons, physicians, directors, and superintendents.

I have here a brief report from an association which sent me as a delegate to the National Woman Suffrage Convention, in which it is stated that women in Pennsylvania can be elected as directors on school boards or superintendents of schools, but can not help to elect those officers. It must very readily occur to your minds that when women take such interest in the schools as mothers must needs take they must feel many a wish to control the election of the officers, superintendents, and managers of the schools. The ladies here from New York city could, if they had time, give you much testimony in regard to the management of schools in New York city, and the need there of woman's love and woman's power in the schools and on the school boards. I am also authorized by the association which sent me here to report that the woman-suffragists and some other woman organizations of the city of Philadelphia have condemned in resolution the action of the governor a year ago, I think, in vetoing a bill which passed largely both houses of the Legislature to appoint women inspectors of prisons. On such questions woman feels the need of the ballot.

The mothers of this land, having breathed the air of freedom and received the benefits of education, have come to see the necessity of better conditions to fulfill their divinely appointed and universally recognized office. The mothers of this land claim that they have a right to assist in making the laws which control the social relations. We are under the laws inherited from barbarism. They are not the conditions suited to the best exercise of the office of woman, and the women desire the ballot to purge society of the vices that are sure to disintegrate the home, the State, the nation.

I shall not occupy your time further this morning. I only present briefly the mother's claim, as it is so universally conceded. We now have in our schools a very large majority of women teachers, and it seems to me no one can but recognize the fact that mothers, through their experience in the family, mothers who are at all competent and fit to fulfill their position as mothers in the family, are best fitted to understand the needs and at least should have an equal voice in directing the management of the schools, and also the management of penal and reformatory institutions.

I was in hopes that Mrs. Wallace would give you the testimony she gave us in the convention of the wonderful, amazing good that was accomplished in a reformatory institution where an incorrigible woman was taken from the men's prison and became not only very tractable, but very helpful in an institution under the influence and management of women. That reformatory institution is managed wholly by women. There is not a man, Mrs. Wallace says, in the building, except the engineer who controls the fire department. Under a management wholly by women, the institution is a very great success. We feel sure that in many ways the influence and power that the mothers bring would tend to convert many conditions that are now tending to destruction through vices, would tend to elevate us morally, purify us, bring us still higher in the standard of humanity, and make us what we ought to be, a holy as well as a happy nation.

REMARKS BY MRS. SARA A. SPENCER, OF WASHINGTON.

Mrs. SPENCER. Miss Susan B. Anthony was chosen to present the constitutional argument in our case before the committee. Unless there is more important business for the individual members of the committee than the protection of one-half of our population, I trust that the limit fixed for our hearing will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Miss Anthony is entitled to an hour.

Mrs. SPENCER. Good. Miss Anthony is from the United States; the whole United States claim her.

Mrs. ALLEN. I have made arrangements with Miss Anthony to say all that I feel it necessary for me to say at this time.

Mrs. SPENCER. I have been so informed.

REMARKS BY MRS. NANCY R. ALLEN, OF IOWA.

Mrs. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee: I am not a State representative, but I am a representative of a large class of women, citizens of Iowa, who are heavy tax-payers. That is a subject which we are very seriously contemplating at this time. There is now a petition being circulated throughout our State, to be presented to the Legislature, praying that women be exempted from taxation until they have some voice in the management of local affairs of the State. You may ask, "Do not your husbands protect you? Are not all the men protecting you?" We answer that our husbands are grand, noble men, who are willing to do all they can for us, but there are many who have no husbands, and who own a great deal of property in the State of Iowa. Particularly in great moral reforms the women there feel the need of the ballot. By presenting long petitions to the Legislature they have succeeded in having better temperance laws enacted, but the men have failed to elect officials who will enforce those laws. Consequently they have become as dead letters upon the statute-books.

I would refer again to taxes. I have a list showing that in my city three women pay more taxes than all the city officials included. Those women are good temperance women. Our city council is composed almost entirely of saloon men and those who visit saloons and brewery men. There are some good men, but the good men being in the minority, the voices of these women are but little regarded. All these officials are paid, and we have to help support them. All that we ask is an equality of rights. As Sumner said, "Equality of rights is the first of rights." If we can only be equal with man under the law it is all that we ask. We do not propose to relinquish our domestic circles; in fact, they are too dear to us for that; they are dear to us as life itself, but we do ask that we may be permitted to be represented. Equality of taxation without representation is tyranny.

REMARKS BY MISS SUSAN B. ANTHONY, OF NEW YORK.

Miss ANTHONY: Mr. Chairman and gentlemen: Mrs. Spencer said that I would make an argument. I do not propose to do so, because I take it for granted that the members of this committee understand that we have all the argument on our side, and such an argument would be simply a series of platitudes and maxims of government. The theory of this Government from the beginning has been perfect equality to all the people. That is shown by every one of the fundamental principles, which I need not stop to repeat. Such being the theory, the application would be, of course, that all persons not having forfeited their right to representation in the Government should be possessed of it at the age of twenty-one. But instead of adopting a practice in conformity with the theory of our Government, we began first by saying that all men of property were the people of the nation upon whom the Constitution conferred equality of rights. The next step was that all white men were the people to whom should be practically applied the fundamental theories. There we halt to-day and stand at a deadlock, so far as the application of our theory may go. We women have been standing before the American republic for thirty years, asking the men to take yet one step further and extend the practical application of the theory of equality of rights to all the people to the other half of the people—the women. That is all that I stand here to-day to attempt to demand.

Of course, I take it for granted that the committee are in sympathy at least with the reports of the Judiciary Committees presented both in the Senate and the House. I remember that after the adoption of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments Senator EDMUNDS reported on the petition of the ten thousand foreign-born citizens of Rhode Island who were denied equality of rights in Rhode Island simply because of their foreign birth; and in that report held that the amendments were enacted and attached to the Constitution simply for men of color, and therefore that their provisions could not be so construed as to bring within their purview the men of foreign birth in Rhode Island. Then the House Committee on the Judiciary, with Judge Bingham, of Ohio, at its head, made a similar report upon our petitions, holding that because those amendments were made essentially with the black men in view, therefore their provisions could not be extended to the women citizens of this country or to any class except men citizens of color.

I voted in the State of New York in 1872 under the construction of those amendments, which we felt to be the true one, that all persons born in the United States, or any State thereof, and under the jurisdiction of the United States, were citizens, and entitled to equality of rights, and that no State could deprive them of their equality of rights. I found three young men, inspectors of election, who were simple enough to read the Constitution and understand it in accordance with what was the letter and what should have been its spirit. Then, as you will remember, I was prosecuted by the officers of the Federal court, and the cause was carried through the different courts in the State of New York, in the northern district, and at last I was brought to trial at Canandaigua.

When Mr. Justice Hunt was brought from the supreme bench to sit upon that trial, he wrested my case from the hands of the jury altogether, after having listened three days to testimony, and brought in a verdict himself of guilty, denying to my counsel even the poor privilege of having the jury polled. Through all that trial when I, as a citizen of the United States, as a citizen of the State of New York and city of Rochester, as a person who had done something at least that might have entitled her to a voice in speaking for herself and for her class, in all that trial I not only was denied my right to testify as to whether I voted or not, but there was not one single woman's voice to be heard nor to be considered, except as witnesses, save when it came to the judge asking, "Has the prisoner anything to say why sentence shall not be pronounced?" Neither as judge, nor as attorney, nor as jury was I allowed any person who could be legitimately called my peer to speak for me.

Then, as you will remember, Mr. Justice Hunt not only pronounced the verdict of guilty, but a sentence of $100 fine and costs of prosecution. I said to him, "May it please your honor, I do not propose to pay it;" and I never have paid it, and I never shall. I asked your honorable bodies of Congress the next year—in 1874—to pass a resolution to remit that fine. Both Houses refused it; the committees reported against it; though through Benjamin F. Butler, in the House, and a member of your committee, and Matthew H. Carpenter, in the Senate, there were plenty of precedents brought forward to show that in the cases of multitudes of men fines had been remitted. I state this merely to show the need of woman to speak for herself, to be as judge, to be as juror.

Mr. Justice Hunt in his opinion stated that suffrage was a fundamental right, and therefore a right that belonged to the State. It seemed to me that was just as much of a retroversion of the theory of what is right in our Government as there could possibly be. Then, after the decision in my case came that of Mrs. Minor, of Missouri. She prosecuted the officers there for denying her the right to vote. She carried her case up to your Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court answered her the same way; that the amendments were made for black men; that their provisions could not protect women; that the Constitution of the United States has no voters of its own.

Mrs. SPENCER. And you remember Judge Cartter's decision in my case.

Miss ANTHONY. Mr. Cartter said that women are citizens and may be qualified, &c., but that it requires some sort of legislation to give them the right to vote.

The Congress of the United States notwithstanding, and the Supreme Court of the United States notwithstanding, with all deference and respect, I differ with them all, and know that I am right and that they are wrong. The Constitution of the United States as it is protects me. If I could get a practical application of the Constitution it would protect me and all women in the enjoyment of perfect equality of rights everywhere under the shadow of the American flag.

I do not come to you to petition for special legislation, or for any more amendments to the Constitution, because I think they are unnecessary, but because you say there is not in the Constitution enough to protect me. Therefore I ask that you, true to your own theory and assertion, should go forward to make more constitution.

Let me remind you that in the case of all other classes of citizens under the shadow of our flag you have been true to the theory that taxation and representation are inseparable. Indians not taxed are not counted in the basis of representation, and are not allowed to vote; but the minute that your Indians are counted in the basis of representation and are allowed to vote they are taxed; never before. In my State of New York, and in nearly all the States, the members of the State militia, hundreds and thousands of men, are exempted from taxation on property; in my State to the value of $800, and in most of the States to a value in that neighborhood. While such a member of the militia lives, receives his salary, and is able to earn money, he is exempted; but when he dies the assessor puts his widow's name down upon the assessor's list, and the tax-collector never fails to call upon the widow and make her pay the full tax upon her property. In most of the States clergymen are exempted. In my State of New York they are exempted on property to the value of $1,500. As long as the clergyman lives and receives his fat salary, or his lean one, as the case may be, he is exempted on that amount of property; but when the breath leaves the body of the clergyman, and the widow is left without any income, or without any means of support, the State comes in and taxes the widow.

So it is with regard to all black men. In the State of New York up to the day of the passage of the fifteenth amendment, black men who were willing to remain without reporting themselves worth as much as $250, and thereby to remain without exercising the right to vote, never had their names put on the assessor's list; they were passed by, while, if the poorest colored woman owned 50 feet of real estate, a little cabin anywhere, that colored woman's name was always on the assessor's list, and she was compelled to pay her tax. While Frederick Douglas lived in my State he was never allowed to vote until he could show himself worth the requisite $250; and when he did vote in New York, he voted not because he was a man, not because he was a citizen of the United States, nor yet because he was a citizen of the State, but simply because he was worth the requisite amount of money. In Connecticut both black men and black women were exempted from taxation prior to the adoption of the fifteenth amendment.

The law was amended in 1848, by which black men were thus exempted, and black women followed the same rule in that State. That, I believe, is the only State where black women were exempted from taxation under the law. When the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were attached to the Constitution they carried to the black man of Connecticut the boon of the ballot as well as the burden of taxation, whereas they carried to the black woman of Connecticut the burden of taxation, but no ballot by which to protect her property. I know a colored woman in New Haven, Conn., worth $50,000, and she never paid a penny of taxation until the ratification of the fifteenth amendment. From that day on she is compelled to pay a heavy tax on that amount of property.

Mrs. SPENCER. Is it because she is a citizen? Please explain.

Miss ANTHONY. Because she is black.

Mrs. SPENCER. Is it because the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments made women citizens?

Miss ANTHONY. Certainly; because it declared the black people citizens.

Gentlemen, you have before you various propositions of amendment to the Federal Constitution. One is for the election of President by the vote of the people direct. Of course women are not people.

Senator EDMUNDS. Angels.

Miss ANTHONY. Yes; angels up in heaven or else devils down there.

Senator EDMUNDS. I have never known any of that kind.

Miss ANTHONY. I wish you, gentlemen, would look down there and see the myriads that are there. We want to help them and lift them up. That is exactly the trouble with you, gentlemen; you are forever looking at you own wives, your own mothers, your own sisters, and your own daughters, and they are well cared for and protected; but only look down to the struggling masses of women who have no one to protect them, neither husband, father, brother, son, with no mortal in all the land to protect them. If you would look down there the question would be solved; but the difficulty is that you think only of those who are doing well. We are not speaking for ourselves, but for those who can not speak for themselves. We are speaking for the doomed as much as you, Senator EDMUNDS, used to speak for the doomed on the plantations of the South.

Amendments have been proposed to put God in the Constitution and to keep God out of the Constitution. All sorts of propositions to amend the Constitution have been made; but I ask that you allow no other amendment to be called the sixteenth but that which shall put into the hands of one-half of the entire people of the nation the right to express their opinions as to how the Constitution shall be amended henceforth. Women have the right to say whether we shall have God in the Constitution as well as men. Women have a right to say whether we shall have a national law or an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the importation or manufacture of alcoholic liquors. We have a right to have our opinions counted on every possible question concerning the public welfare.

You ask us why we do not get this right to vote first in the school districts, and on school questions, or the questions of liquor license. It has been shown very clearly why we need something more than that. You have good enough laws to-day in every State in this Union for the suppression of what are termed the social vices; for the suppression of the grog-shops, the gambling houses, the brothels, the obscene shows. There is plenty of legislation in every State in this Union for their suppression if it could be executed. Why is the Government, why are the States and the cities, unable to execute those laws? Simply because there is a large balance of power in every city that does not want those laws executed. Consequently both parties must alike cater to that balance of political power. The party that puts a plank in its platform that the laws against the grog-shops and all the other sinks of iniquity must be executed, is the party that will not get this balance of power to vote for it, and, consequently, the party that can not get into power.

What we ask of you is that you will make of the women of the cities a balance of political power, so that when a mayor, a member of the common council, a supervisor, a justice of the peace, a district attorney, a judge on the bench even, shall go before the people of that city as a candidate for the suffrages of the people he shall not only be compelled to look to the men who frequent the grog-shops, the brothels, and the gambling houses, who will vote for him if he is not in favor of executing the law, but that he shall have to look to the mothers, the sisters, the wives, the daughters of those deluded men to see what they will do if he does not execute the law.

We want to make of ourselves a balance of political power. What we need is the power to execute the laws. We have got laws enough. Let me give you one little fact in regard to my own city of Rochester. You all know how that wonderful whip called the temperance crusade roused the whisky ring. It caused the whisky force to concentrate itself more strongly at the ballot-box than ever before, so that when the report of the elections in the spring of 1874 went over the country the result was that the whisky ring was triumphant, and that the whisky ticket was elected more largely than ever before. Senator Thurman will remember how it was in his own State of Ohio. Everybody knows that if my friends, Mrs. ex-Governor Wallace, Mrs. Allen, and all the women of the great West could have gone to the ballot-box at those municipal elections and voted for candidates, no such result would have occurred; while you refused by the laws of the State to the women the right to have their opinions counted, every rumseller, every drunkard, every pauper even from the poor-house, and every criminal outside of the State's prison came out on election day to express his opinion and have it counted.

The next result of that political event was that the ring demanded new legislation to protect the whisky traffic everywhere. In my city the women did not crusade the streets, but they said they would help the men to execute the law. They held meetings, sent out committees, and had testimony secured against every man who had violated the law, and when the board of excise held its meeting those women assembled, three or four hundred, in the church one morning, and marched in a solid body to the common council chamber where the board of excise was sitting. As one rum-seller after another brought in his petition for a renewal of license who had violated the law, those women presented the testimony against him. The law of the State of New York is that no man shall have a renewal who has violated the law. But in not one case did that board refuse to grant a renewal of license because of the testimony which those women presented, and at the close of the sitting it was found that twelve hundred more licenses had been granted than ever before in the history of the State. Then the defeated women said they would have those men punished according to law.

Again they retained an attorney and appointed committees to investigate all over the city. They got the proper officer to prosecute every rum-seller. I was at their meeting. One woman reported that the officer in every city refused to prosecute the liquor dealer who had violated the law. Why? Because if he should do so he would lose the votes of all the employés of certain shops on that street, if another he would lose the votes of the railroad employés, and if another he would lose the German vote, if another the Irish vote, and so on. I said to those women what I say to you, and what I know to be true to-day, that if the women of the city of Rochester had held the power of the ballot in their hands they would have been a great political balance of power.

The last report was from District Attorney Raines. The women complained of a certain lager-beer-garden keeper. Said the district attorney, "Ladies, you are right, this man is violating the law, everybody knows it, but if I should prosecute him I would lose the entire German vote." Said I, "Ladies, do you not see that if the women of the city of Rochester had the right to vote District Attorney Raines would have been compelled to have stopped and counted, weighed and measured. He would have said, 'If I prosecute that lager-beer German I shall lose the 5,000 German votes of this city, but if I fail to prosecute him and execute the laws I shall lose the votes of 20,000 women.'"

Do you not see, gentlemen, that so long as you put this power of the ballot in the hands of every possible man, rich, poor, drunk, sober, educated, ignorant, outside of the State's prison, to make and unmake, not only every law and lawmaker, but every office holder who has to do with the executing of the law, and take the power from the hands of the women of the nation, the mothers, you put the long arm of the lever, as we call it in mechanics, in the hands of the whisky power and make it utterly impossible for regulation of sobriety to be maintained in our community? The first step towards social regulation and good society in towns, cities, and villages is the ballot in the hands of the mothers of those places. I appeal to you especially in this matter. I do not know what you think about the proper sphere of women.

It matters little what any of us think about it. We shall each and every individual find our own proper sphere if we are left to act in freedom; but my opinion is that when the whole arena of politics and government is thrown open to women they will endeavor to do very much as they do in their homes; that the men will look after the greenback theory or the hard-money theory, that you will look after free-trade or tariff, and the women will do the home housekeeping of the government, which is to take care of the moral government and the social regulation of our home department.

It seems to me that we have the power of government outside to shape and control circumstances, but that the inside power, the government housekeeping, is powerless, and is compelled to accept whatever conditions or circumstances shall be granted.

Therefore I do not ask for liquor suffrage alone, nor for school suffrage alone, because that would amount to nothing. We must be able to have a voice in the election not only of every law-maker, but of every one who has to do either with the making or the executing of the laws.

Then you ask why we do not get suffrage by the popular-vote method, State by State? I answer, because there is no reason why I, for instance, should desire the women of one State of this nation to vote any more than the women of another State. I have no more interest as regards the women of New York than I have as regards the women of Indiana, Iowa, or any of the States represented by the women who have come up here. The reason why I do not wish to get this right by what you call the popular-vote method, the State vote, is because I believe there is a United States citizenship. I believe that this is a nation, and to be a citizen of this nation should be a guaranty to every citizen of the right to a voice in the Government, and should give to me my right to express my opinion. You deny to me my liberty, my freedom, if you say that I shall have no voice whatever in making, shaping, or controlling the conditions of society in which I live. I differ from Judge Hunt, and I hope I am respectful when I say that I think he made a very funny mistake when he said that fundamental rights belong to the States and only surface rights to the National Government. I hope you will agree with me that the fundamental right of citizenship, the right to voice in the Government, is a national right.

The National Government may concede to the States the right to decide by a majority as to what banks they shall have, what laws they shall enact with regard to insurance, with regard to property, and any other question; but I insist upon it that the National Government should not leave it a question with the States that a majority in any State may disfranchise the minority under any circumstances whatsoever. The franchise to you men is not secure. You hold it to-day, to be sure, by the common consent of white men, but if at any time, on your principle of government, the majority of any of the States should choose to amend the State constitution so as to disfranchise this or that portion of the white men by making this or that condition, by all the decisions of the Supreme Court and by the legislation thus far there is nothing to hinder them.

Therefore the women demand a sixteenth amendment to bring to women the right to vote, or if you please to confer upon women their right to vote, to protect them in it, and to secure men in their right, because you are not secure.

I would let the States act upon almost every other question by majorities, except the power to say whether my opinion shall be counted. I insist upon it that no State shall decide that question.

Then the popular-vote method is an impracticable thing. We tried to get negro suffrage by the popular vote, as you will remember. Senator Thurman will remember that in Ohio the Republicans submitted the question in 1867, and with all the prestige of the national Republican party and of the State party, when every influence that could be brought by the power and the patronage of the party in power was brought to bear, yet negro suffrage ran behind the regular Republican ticket 40,000.

It was tried in Kansas, it was tried in New York, and everywhere that it was submitted the question was voted down overwhelmingly. Just so we tried to get women suffrage by the popular-vote method in Kansas in 1867, in Michigan in 1874, in Colorado in 1877, and in each case the result was precisely the same, the ratio of the vote standing one-third for women suffrage and two-thirds against women suffrage. If we were to canvass State after State we should get no better vote than that. Why? Because the question of the enfranchisement of women is a question of government, a question of philosophy, of understanding, of great fundamental principle, and the masses of the hard-working people of this nation, men and women, do not think upon principles. They can only think on the one eternal struggle wherewithal to be fed, to be clothed, and to be sheltered. Therefore I ask you not to compel us to have this question settled by what you term the popular-vote method.

Let me illustrate by Colorado, the most recent State, in the election of 1877. I am happy to say to you that I have canvassed three States for this question. If Senator Chandler were alive, or if Senator Ferry were in this room, they would remember that I followed in their train in Michigan, with larger audiences than either of those Senators throughout the whole canvass. I want to say, too, that although those Senators may have believed in woman suffrage, they did not say much about it. They did not help us much. The Greenback movement was quite popular in Michigan at that time. The Republicans and Greenbackers made a most humble bow to the grangers, but woman suffrage did not get much help. In Colorado, at the close of the canvass, 6,666 men voted "Yes." Now I am going to describe the men who voted "Yes." They were native-born white men, temperance men, cultivated, broad, generous, just men, men who think. On the other hand, 16,007 voted "No."

Now I am going to describe that class of voters. In the southern part of that State there are Mexicans, who speak the Spanish language. They put their wheat in circles on the ground with the heads out, and drive a mule around to thrash it. The vast population of Colorado is made up of that class of people. I was sent out to speak in a voting precinct having 200 voters; 150 of those voters were Mexican greasers, 40 of them foreign-born citizens, and just 10 of them were born in this country; and I was supposed to be competent to convert those men to let me have as much right in this Government as they had, when, unfortunately, the great majority of them could not understand a word that I said. Fifty or sixty Mexican greasers stood against the wall with their hats down over their faces. The Germans put seats in a lager-beer saloon, and would not attend unless I made a speech there; so I had a small audience.

Mrs. ARCHIBALD. There is one circumstance that I should like to relate. In the county of Las Animas, a county where there is a large population of Mexicans, and where they always have a large majority over the native population, they do not know our language at all. Consequently a number of tickets must be printed for those people in Spanish. The gentleman in our litle town of Trinidad who had the charge of the printing of those tickets, being adverse to us, had every ticket printed against woman suffrage. The samples that were sent to us from Denver were "for" or "against," but the tickets that were printed only had the word "against" on them, so that our friends had to scratch their tickets, and all those Mexican people who could not understand this trick and did not know the facts of the case, voted against woman suffrage; so that we lost a great many votes. This was man's generosity.

Miss ANTHONY. Special legislation for the benefit of woman! I will admit you that on the floor of the constitutional convention was a representative Mexican, intelligent, cultivated, chairman of the committee on suffrage, who signed the petition, and was the first to speak in favor of woman suffrage. Then they have in Denver about four hundred negroes. Governor Routt said to me, "The four hundred Denver negroes are going to vote solid for woman suffrage." I said, "I do not know much about the Denver negroes, but I know certainly what all negroes were educated in, and slavery never educated master or negro into a comprehension of the great principles of human freedom of our nation; it is not possible, and I do not believe they are going to vote for us." Just ten of those Denver negroes voted for woman suffrage. Then, in all the mines of Colorado the vast majority of the wage laborers, as you know, are foreigners.

There may be intelligent foreigners in this country, and I know there are, who are in favor of the enfranchisement of woman, but that one does not happen to be Carl Schurz, I am ashamed to say. And I want to say to you of Carl Schurz, that side by side with that man on the battlefield of Germany was Madame Anneke, as noble a woman as ever trod the American soil. She rode by the side of her husband, who was an officer, on the battlefield; she slept in battlefield tents, and she fled from Germany to this country, for her life and property, side by side with Carl Schurz. Now, what is it for Carl Schurz, stepping up to the very door of the Presidency and lookiug back to Madame Anneke, who fought for liberty as well as he, to say, "You be subject in this Republic; I will be sovereign." If it is an insult for Carl Schurz to say that to a foreign-born woman, what is it for him to say it to Mrs. Ex-Governor Wallace, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucretia Mott—to the native-born, educated, tax-paying women of this Republic? I can forgive an ignorant foreigner; I can forgive an ignorant negro; but I can not forgive Carl Schurz.

Right in the file of the foreigners opposed to woman suffrage, educated under monarchical governments that do not comprehend our principles, whom I have seen traveling through the prairies of Iowa or the prairies of Minnesota, are the Bohemians, Swedes, Norwegians, Germans, Irishmen, Mennonites; I have seen them riding on those magnificent loads of wheat with those magnificent Saxon horses, shining like glass on a sunny morning, every one of them going to vote "no" against woman suffrage. You can not convert them; it is impossible. Now and then there is a whisky manufacturer, drunkard, inebriate, libertine, and what we call a fast man, and a colored man, broad and generous enough to be willing to let women vote, to let his mother have her opinion counted as to whether there shall be license or no license, but the rank and file of all classes who wish to enjoy full license in what are termed the petty vices of men are pitted solid against the enfranchisement of women.

Then, in addition to all these, there are, as you know, a few religious bigots left in the world who really believe that somehow or other if women are allowed to vote St. Paul would feel badly about it. I do not know but that some of the gentlemen present belong to that class. [Laughter.] So, when you put those best men of the nation, having religion about everything except on this one question, whose prejudices control them, with all this vast mass of ignorant, uneducated, degraded population in this country, you make an overwhelming and insurmountable majority against the enfranchisement of women.

It is because of this fact that I ask you not to remand us back to the States, but to submit to the States the proposition of a sixteenth amendment. The popular-vote method is not only of itself an impossibility, but it is too humiliating a process to compel the women of this nation to submit to any longer.

I am going to give you an illustration, not because I have any disrespect for the person, because on many other questions he was really a good deal better than a good many other men who had not so bad a name in this nation. When, under the old régime, John Morrissey, of my State, the king of gamblers, was a Representative on the floor of Congress, it was humiliating enough for Lucretia Mott, for Elizabeth Cady Stanton, for all of us to come down here to Washington and beg at the feet of John Morrissey that he would let intelligent, native-born women vote, and let us have as much right in this Government and in the government of the city of New York as he had. When John Morrissey was a member of the New York State Legislature it would have been humiliating enough for us to go to the New York State Legislature and pray of John Morrissey to vote to ratify the sixteenth amendment, giving to us a right to vote; but if instead of a sixteenth amendment you tell us to go back to the popular-vote method, the old-time method, and go down into John Morrissey's seventh Congressional district in the city of New York, and there, in the sloughs and slums of that great Sodom, in the grog-shops, the gambling-houses, and the brothels, beg at the feet of each individual fisticuff of his constituency to give the noble, educated, native-born, tax-paying women of the State of New York as much right as he has, that would be too bitter a pill for a native-born woman to swallow any longer.

I beg you, gentlemen, to save us from the mortification and the humiliation of appealing to the rabble. We already have on our side the vast majority of the better educated—the best classes of men. You will remember that Senator Christiancy, of Michigan, two years ago, said on the floor of the Senate that of the 40,000 men who voted for woman suffrage in Michigan it was said that there was not a drunkard, not a libertine, not a gambler, not a depraved, low man among them. Is not that something that tells for us, and for our right? It is the fact, in every State of the Union, that we have the intelligent lawyers and the most liberal ministers of all the sects, not excepting the Roman Catholics. A Roman Catholic priest preached a sermon the other day, in which he said, "God grant that there were a thousand Susan B. Anthonys in this city to vote and work for temperance." When a Catholic priest says that there is a great moral necessity pressing down upon this nation demanding the enfranchisement of women. I ask you that you shall not drive us back to beg our rights at the feet of the most ignorant and depraved men of the nation, but that you, the representative men of the nation, will hold the question in the hollow of your hands. We ask you to lift this question out of the hands of the rabble.

You who are here upon the floor of Congress in both Houses are the picked men of the nation. You may say what you please about John Morrissey, the gambler, &c.: he was head and shoulders above the rank and file of his constituency. The world may gabble ever so much about members of Congress being corrupt and being bought and sold; they are as a rule head and shoulders among the great majority who compose their State governments. There is no doubt about it. Therefore I ask of you, as representative men, as men who think, as men who study, as men who philosophize, as men who know, that you will not drive us back to the States any more, but that you will carry out this method of procedure which has been practiced from the beginning of the Government; that is, that you will put a prohibitory amendment in the Constitution and submit the proposition to the several State legislatures. The amendment which has been presented before you reads:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. The right of suffrage in the United States shall be based on citizenship, and the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of sex, or for any reason not equally applicable to all citizens of the United States.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In this way we would get the right of suffrage just as much by what you call the consent of the States, or the States' rights method, as by any other method. The only point is that it is a decision by the representative men of the States instead of by the rank and file of the ignorant men of the States. If you would submit this proposition for a sixteenth amendment, by a two-thirds vote of the two Houses to the several legislatures, and the several legislatures ratify it, that would be just as much by the consent of the States as if Tom, Dick, and Harry voted "yes" or "no." Is it not, Senator? I want to talk to Democrats as well as Republicans, to show that it is a State's rights method.

Senator EDMUNDS. Does anybody propose any other, in case it is done at all by the nation?

Miss ANTHONY. Not by the nation, but they are continualiy driving us back to get it from the States, State by State. That is the point I want to make. We do not want you to drive us back to the States. We want you men to take the question out of the hands of the rabble of the State.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt you?

Miss ANTHONY. Yes, sir; I wish you would.

The CHAIRMAN. You have reflected on this subject a great deal. You think there is a majority, as I understand, even in the State of New York, against women suffrage?

Miss ANTHONY. Yes, sir; overwhelmingly.

The CHAIRMAN. How, then, would you get Legislatures elected to ratify such a constitutional amendment?

Miss ANTHONY. That brings me exactly to the point.

The CHAIHMAN. That is the point I wish to hear you upon.

Miss ANTHONY. Because the members of the State Legislatures are intelligent men and can vote and enact laws embodying great principles of the government without in anywise endangering their positions with their constituencies. A constituency composed of ignorant men would vote solid against us because they have never thought on the question. Every man or woman who believes in the enfranchisement of women is educated out of every idea that he or she was born into. We were all born into the idea that the proper sphere of women is subjection, and it takes education and thought and culture to lift us out of it. Therefore when men go to the ballot-box they all vote "no," unless they have actual argument on it. I will illustrate. We have six Legislatures in the nation, for instance, that have extended the right to vote on school questions to the women, and not a single member of the State Legislature has ever lost his office or forfeited the respect or confidence of his constituents as a representative because he voted to give women the right to vote on school questions. It is a question that the unthinking masses never have thought upon. They do not care about it one way or the other, only they have an instinctive feeling that because women never did vote therefore it is wrong that they ever should vote.

Mrs. SPENCER. Do make the point that the Congress of the United States leads the Legislatures of the States and educates them.

Miss ANTHONY. When you, representative men, carry this matter to Legislatures, State by State, they will ratify it. My point is that you can safely do this. Senator Thurman, of Ohio, would not lose a single vote in Ohio in voting in favor of the enfranchisement of women. Senator EDMUNDS would not lose a single Republican vote in the State of Vermont if he puts himself on our side, which, I think, he will do. It is not a political question. We are no political power that can make or break either party to-day. Consequently each man is left independent to express his own moral and intellectual convictions on the matter without endangering himself politically.

Senator EDMUNDS. I think, Miss Anthony, you ought to put it on rather higher, I will not say stronger, ground. If you can convince us that it is right we would not stop to see how it affected us politically.

Miss ANTHONY. I was coming to that. I was going to say to all of you men in office here to-day that if you can not go forward and carry out either your Democratic or your Republican or your Greenback theories, for instance, on the finance, there is no great political power that is going to take you away from these halls and prevent you from doing all those other things which you want to do, and you can act out your own moral and intellectual convictions on this without let or hindrance.

Senator EDMUNDS. Without any danger to the public interests, you mean.

Miss ANTHONY. Without any danger to the public interests. I did not mean to make a bad insinuation, Senator.

I want to give you another reason why we appeal to you. In these three States where the question has been submitted and voted down we can not get another Legislature to resubmit it, because they say the people have expressed their opinion and decided no, and therefore nobody with any political sense would resubmit the question. It is therefore impossible in any one of those States. We have tried hard in Kansas for ten years to get the question resubmitted; the vote of that State seems to be taken as a finality. We ask you to lift the sixteenth amendment out of the arena of the public mass into the arena of thinking legislative brains, the brains of the nation, under the law and the Constitution. Not only do we ask it for that purpose, but when you will have by a two-thirds vote submitted the proposition to the several Legislatures, you have put the pin down and it never can go back. No subsequent Congress can revoke that submission of the proposition; there will be so much gained; it can not slide back. Then we will go to New York or to Pennsylvania, and urge upon the Legislatures the ratification of that amendment. They may refuse; they may vote it down the first time. Then we will go to the next Legislature, and the next Legislature, and plead and plead, from year to year, if it takes ten years. It is an open question to every Legislature until we can get one that will ratify it, and when that Legislature has once voted and ratified it no subsequent legislation can revoke their ratification.

Thus, you perceive, Senators, that every step we would gain by this sixteenth amendment process is fast and not to be done over again. That is why I appeal to you especially. As I have shown you in the respective States, if we fail to educate the people of a whole State—and in Michigan it was only six months, and in Colorado less than six months—the State Legislatures say that is the end of it. I appeal to you, therefore, to adopt the course that we suggest.

Gentlemen of the committee, if there is a question that you want to ask me before I make my final appeal, I should like to have you put it now; any question as to constitutional law or your right to go forward. Of course you do not deny to us that this amendment will be right in the line of all the amendments heretofore. The eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth amendments are all in line prohibiting the States from doing something which they heretofore thought they had a right to do. Now we ask you to prohibit the States from denying to women their rights.

I want to show you in closing that of the great acts of justice done during the war and since the war the first one was a great military necessity. We never got one inch of headway in putting down the rebellion until the purpose of this great nation was declared that slavery should be abolished. Then, as if by magic, we went forward and put down the rebellion. At the close of the rebellion the nation stood again at a perfect deadlock. The Republican party was trembling in the balance, because it feared that it could not hold its position until it should have secured by legislation to the Government what it had gained at the point of the sword, and when the nation declared its purpose to enfranchise the negro it was a political necessity. I do not want to take too much vainglory out of the heads of Republicans, but nevertheless it is a great national fact that neither of those great acts of beneficence to the negro race was done because of any high, overshadowing moral conviction on the part of any considerable minority even of the people of this nation, but simply because of a military necessity slavery was abolished, and simply because of a political necessity black men were enfranchised.

The blackest Republican State you had voted down negro suffrage, and that was Kansas in 1867; Michigan voted it down in 1867: Ohio voted it down in 1867. Iowa was the only State that ever voted negro suffrage by a majority of the citizens to which the question was submitted, and they had not more than seventy-five negroes in the whole State; so it was not a very practical question. Therefore, it may be fairly said, I think, that it was a military necessity that compelled one of those acts of justice, and a political necessity that compelled the other.

It seems to me that from the first word uttered by our dear friend, Mrs. ex-Governor Wallace, of Indiana, all the way down, we have been presenting to you the fact that there is a great moral necessity pressing upon this nation to-day, that you shall go forward and attach a sixteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution which shall put in the hands of the women of this nation the power to help make, shape, and control the social conditions of society everywhere. I appeal to you from that standpoint that you shall submit this proposition.

There is one other point to which I want to call your attention. The Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator EDMUNDS chairman, reported that the United States could do nothing to protect women in the right to vote under the amendments. Now I want to give you a few points where the United States interferes to take away the right to vote from women where the State has given it to them. In Wyoming, for instance, by a Democratic legislature, the women were enfranchised. They were not only allowed to vote but to sit upon juries, the same as men. Those of you who read the reports giving the results of that action have not forgotten that the first result of women sitting upon juries was that wherever there was a violation of the whisky law they brought in verdicts accordingly for the execution of the law; and you will remember, too, that the first man who ever had a verdict of guilty for murder in the first degree in that Territory was tried by a jury made up largely of women. Always up to that day every jury had brought in a verdict of shot in self-defense, although the person shot down may have been entirely unarmed. Then, in cities like Cheyenne and Laramie, persons entered complaints against keepers of houses of ill-fame.

Women were on the jury, and the result was in every case that before the juries could bring in a bill of indictment the women had taken the train and left the town. Why do you hear no more of women sitting on juries in that Territory? Simply because the United States marshal, who is appointed by the President to go to Wyoming, refuses to put the names of women into the box from which the jury is drawn. There the United States Government interferes to take the right away.

A DELEGATE. I should like to state that Governor Hoyt, of Wyoming, who was the governor who signed the act giving to women this right, informed me that the right had been restored, and that his sister, who resides there, recently served on a jury.

Miss ANTHONY. I am glad to hear it. It is two years since I was there, but I was told that that was the case. In Utah the women were given the right to vote, but a year and a half ago their Legislative Assembly found that although they had the right to vote the Territorial law provided that only male voters should hold office. The Legislative Assembly of Utah passed a bill providing that women should be eligible to all the offices of the Territory. The school offices, superintendents of schools, were the offices in particular to which the women wanted to be elected. Governor Emory, appointed by the President of the United States, vetoed that bill. Thus the full operations of enfranchisement conferred by two of the Territories has been stopped by Federal interference.

You ask why I come here instead of going to the State Legislatures. You say that whenever the Legislatures extend the right of suffrage to us by the constitutions of their States we can get it. Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Minnesota, Colorado, Kansas, Oregon, all these States, have had the school suffrage extended by legislative enactment. If the question had been submitted to the rank and file of the people of Boston, with 66,000 men paying nothing but the poll-tax, they would have undoubtedly voted against letting women have the right to vote for members of the school board; but their intelligent representatives on the floor of the Legislature voted in favor of the extension of the school suffrage to the women. The first result in Boston has been the election of quite a number of women to the school board. In Minnesota, in the little town of Rochester, the school board declared its purpose to cut the women teachers' wages down. It did not propose to touch the principal, who was a man, but they proposed to cut all the women down from $50 to $35. One woman put her bonnet on and went over the entire town and said, "We have got a right to vote for this school board, and let us do so." They all turned out and voted, and not a single $35 man was re-elected, but all those who were in favor of paying $50.

It seems to be a sort of charity to let a woman teach school. You say here that if a woman has a father, mother, or brother, or anybody to support her, she can not have a place in the Departments. In the city of Rochester they can not let a married woman teach school because she has got a husband, and it is supposed he ought to support her. The women are working in the Departments, as everywhere else, for half price, and the only pretext, you tell us, for keeping women there is because the Government can economize by employing women for less money. The other day when I saw a newspaper item stating that the Government proposed to compensate Miss Josephine Meeker for all her bravery, heroism, and terrible sufferings by giving her a place in the Interior Department, it made my blood boil to the ends of my fingers and toes. To give that girl a chance to work in the Department; to do just as much work as a man, and pay her half as much, was a charity. That was a beneficence on the part of this grand Government to her. We want the ballot for bread. When we do equal work we want equal wages.

Mrs. SAXON. California, in her recent convention, prohibits the Legislature hereafter from enacting any law for woman's suffrage, does it not?

Miss ANTHONY. I do not know. I have not seen the new constitution.

Mrs. SAXON. It does. The convention inserted a provision in the constitution that the Legislature could not act upon the subject at all.

Miss ANTHONY. Everywhere that we have gone, Senators, to ask our right at the hands of any legislative or political body, we have been the subjects of ridicule. For instance, I went before the great national Democratic convention in New York, in 1868, as a delegate from the New York Woman Suffrage Association, to ask that great party, now that it wanted to come to the front again, to put a genuine Jeffersonian plank in its platform, pledging the ballot to all citizens, women as well as men, should it come into power. You may remember how Mr. Seymour ordered my petition to be read, after looking at it in the most scrutinizing manner, when it was referred to the committee on resolutions, where it has slept the sleep of death from that day to this. But before the close of the convention a body of ignorant workingmen sent in a petition clamoring for greenbacks, and you remember that the Democratic party bought those men by putting a solid greenback plank in the platform.

Everybody supposed they would nominate Pendleton, or some other man of pronounced views, but instead of doing that they nominated Horatio Seymour, who stood on the fence, politically speaking. My friends, Mrs. Stanton, Lucretia Mott, and women who have brains and education, women who are tax-payers, went there and petitioned for the practical application of the fundamental principles of our Government to one-half of the people. Those most ignorant workingmen, the vast mass of them foreigners, went there, and petitioned that that great political party should favor greenbacks. Why did they treat those workingmen with respect, and put a greenback plank in their platform, and only table us, and ignore us? Simply because the workingmen represented the power of the ballot. They could make or unmake the great Democratic party at that election. The women were powerless. We could be ridiculed and ignored with impunity, and so we were laughed at, and put on the table.

Then the Republicans went to Chicago, and they did just the same thing. They said the Government bonds must be paid in precisely the currency specified by the Congressional enactment, and Talleyrand himself could not have devised how not to say anything better than the Republicans did at Chicago on that question. Then they nominated a man who had not any financial opinions whatever, and who was not known, except for his military record, and they went into the campaign. Both those parties had this petition from us.

I met a woman in Grand Rapids, Mich., a short time ago. She came to me one morning and told me about the obscene shows licensed in that city, and said that she thought of memorializing the Legislature. I said, "Do; you can not do anything else; you are helpless, but you can petition. Of course they will laugh at you." Notwithstanding, I drew up a petition and she circulated it. Twelve hundred of the best citizens signed that petition, and the lady carried it to the Legislature, just as Mrs. Wallace took her petition in the Indiana Legislature. They read it, laughed at it, and laid it on the table; and at the close of the session, by a unanimous vote, they retired in a solid body to witness the obscene show themselves. After witnessing it, they not only allowed the license to continue for that year, but they have licensed it every year from that day to this, against all the protests of the petitioners. [Laughter.]

Senator EDMUNDS. Do not think we are wanting in respect to you and the ladies here because you say something that makes us laugh.

Miss ANTHONY. You are not laughing at me; you are treating me respectfully, because you are hearing my argument; you are not asleep, not one of you, and I am delighted.

Now, I am going to tell you one other fact. Seven thousand of the best citizens of Illinois petitioned the Legislature of 1877 to give them the poor privilege of voting on the license question. A gentleman presented their petition; the ladies were in the lobbies around the room. A gentleman made a motion that the president of the State association of the Christian Temperance Union be allowed to address the Legislature regarding the petition of the memorialists, when a gentleman sprang to his feet, and said it was well enough for the honorable gentleman to present the petition, and have it received and laid on the table, but "for a gentleman to rise in his seat and propose that the valuable time of the honorable gentlemen of the Illinois Legislature should be consumed in discussing the nonsense of those women is going a little too far. I move that the sergeant-at-arms be ordered to clear the hall of the house of representatives of the mob;" referring to those Christian women. Now, they had had the lobbyists of the whisky ring in that Legislature for years and years, not only around it at respectful distances, but inside the bar, and nobody ever made a motion to clear the halls of the whisky mob there. It only takes Christian women to make a mob.

Mrs. SAXON. We were treated extremely respectfully in Louisiana. It showed plainly the temper of the convention when the present governor admitted that woman suffrage was a fact bound to come. They gave us the privilege of having women on the school boards, but then the officers are appointed by men who are politicians.

Miss ANTHONY. I want to read a few words that come from good authority, for black men at least. I find here a little extract that I copied years ago from the Anti-Slavery Standard of 1870. As you know, Wendell Phillips was the editor of that paper at that time:

"A man with the ballot in his hand is the master of the situation. He defines all his other rights; what is not already given him he takes."

That is exactly what we want, Senators. The rights you have not already given us; we want to get in such a position that we can take them.

"The ballot makes every class sovereign over its own fate. Corruption may steal from a man his independence; capital may starve, and intrigue fetter him, at times; but against all these, his vote, intelligently and honestly cast, is, in the long run, his full protection. If, in the struggle, his fort surrenders, it is only because it is betrayed from within. No power ever permanently wronged a voting class without its own consent."

Senators, I want to ask of you that you will, by the law and parliamentary rules of your committee, allow us to agitate this question by publishing this report and the report which you shall make upon our petitions, as I hope you will make a report. If your committee is so pressed with business that it can not possibly consider and report upon this question, I wish some of you would make a motion on the floor of the Senate that a special committee be appointed to take the whole question of the enfranchisement of women into consideration, and that that committee shall have nothing else to do. This off-year of politics, when there is nothing to do but to try how not to do it (politically, I mean, I am not speaking personally), is the best time you can have to consider the question of woman suffrage, and I ask you to use your influence with the Senate to have it specially attended to this year. Do not make us come here thirty years longer. It is tweve years since the first time I came before a Senate committee. I said then to Charles Sumner, if I could make the honorable Senator from Massachusetts believe that I feel the degradation and the humiliation of disfranchisement precisely as he would if his fellows had adjudged him incompetent from any cause whatever from having his opinion counted at the ballot-box we should have our right to vote in the twinkling of an eye.

REMARKS BY MRS. SARA A. SPENCER, OF WASHINGTON.

Mrs. SPENCER. Congress printed 10,000 copies of its proceedings concerning the memorial services of a dead man, Professor Henry. It cost me three months of hard work to have 3,000 copies of our arguments last year before the Committee on Privileges and Elections printed for 10,000,000 living women. I ask that the committee will have printed 10,000 copies of this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have no power to order the printing. That can only be done by the order of the Senate. A resolution can be offered to that effect in the Senate. I have only to say, ladies, that you will admit that we have listened to you with great attention, and I can certainly say with very great interest. What you have said will be duly and earnestly considered by the committee.

Mrs. WALLACE. I wish to make just one remark in reference to what Senator Thurman said as to the popular vote being against woman suffrage. The popular vote is against it, but not the popular voice. Owing to the temperance agitation in the last six years the growth of the suffrage sentiment among the wives and mothers of this nation has largely increased.

Mrs. SPENCER. In behalf of the women of the United States, permit me to thank the Senate Judiciary Committee for their respectful, courteous, and close attention.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech at this late hour of the day; it would be cruel to the Senate; and I had not expected that this measure would be here this afternoon. I was absent on a public duty and came in just at the close of the speech of my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I wish, however, to say one word in regard to what seemed to be the burden of his speech.

He says that the women who ask this change in our political organization are not simply seeking to be put upon school boards and upon boards of health and charity and upon all the large number of duties of a political nature for which he must confess they are fit, but he says they will want to be President of the United States, and want to be Senators, and want to be marshals and sheriffs, and that seems to him supremely ridiculous. Now I do not understand that that is the proposition. What they want to do and to be is to be eligible to such public duty as a majority of their fellow-citizens may think they are fitted for. The majority of public duties in this country do not require robust, physical health, or exposure to what is base or unhealthy; and when those duties are imposed upon anybody they will be imposed only upon such persons as are fit for them. But they want that if the majority of the American people think a woman like Queen Victoria, or Queen Elizabeth, or Queen Isabella of Spain, or Maria Theresa of Hungary (the four most brilliant sovereigns of any sex in modern history with only two or three exeeptions), the fittest person to be President of the United States, they may be permitted to exercise their choice accordingly.

Old men are eligible to office, old men are allowed to vote, but we do not send old men to war, or make constables or watchmen or overseers of State prisons of old men; and it is utterly idle to suppose that the fitness to vote or the fitness to hold office has anything to do with the physical strength or with the particular mental qualities in regard to which the sexes differ from each other.

Mr. President, my honorable friend spoke of the French revolution and the horrors in which the women of Paris took part, and from that he would argue that American wives and mothers and sisters are not fit for the calm and temperate management of our American republican life. His argument would require him by the same logic to agree that republicanism itself is not fit for human society. The argument is the argument against popular government whether by man or woman, and the Senator only applies to this new phase of the claim of equal rights what his predecessors would argue against the rights we now have applied to us.

But the Senator thought it was unspeakably absurd that a woman with her sentiment and emotional nature and liability to be moved by passion and feeling should hold the office of Senator. Why, Mr. President, the Senator's own speech is a refutation of its own argument. Everybody knows that my honorable friend from Missouri is one of the most brilliant men in this country. He is a logician, he is an orator, he is a man of large experience, he is a lawyer entrusted with large interests; yet when he was called upon to put forth this great effort of his this afternoon and to argue this question which he thinks so clear, what did he do? He furnished the gush and the emotion and the eloquence, but when he came to any argument he had to call upon two women, Mrs. Leonard and Mrs. Whitney to supply all that. [Laughter.] If Mrs. Leonard and Mrs. Whitney have to make the argument in the Senate of the United States for the brilliant and distinguished Senator from Missouri it does not seem to me so absolutely ridiculous that they should have or that women like them should have seats here to make arguments of their own. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no amendment be proposed the question is, shall the joint resolution be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR. Why not take the yeas and nays on the passage?

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call is withdrawn.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon this question the yeas and nays will necessarily be taken.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. I regret that I am not able to vote on this question. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called). I am requested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to say that he is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. STANFORD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber, but I see his colleague voted "nay," and as I am opposed to the resolution I will record my vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I have a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. If he were present I should vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. BROWN. I was requested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to announce his pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], and to say that if the Senator from South Carolina were present he would vote "nay." I do not know how the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I was requested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to announce his pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Blair,	Cullom,	Manderson,	Platt,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sherman,
Cheney,	Farwell,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Teller,
Conger,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—34.

Beck,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Spooner,
Berry,	George,	Mahone,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Morgan,	Vest,
Brown,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Walthall,
Call,	Harris,	Payne,	Whitthorne,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pugh,	Williams,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Eustis,	McMillan,	Sewell,

ABSENT—26.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Sabin,
Butler,	Frye,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Camden,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Miller,	Voorhees.
Chace,	Hale,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Harrison,	Ransom,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two-thirds have not voted for the resolution. It is not passed.

Mr. PLUMB subsequently said: I wish to state that I was unexpectedly called out of the Senate just before the vote was taken on the constitutional amendment, and to also state that if I had been here I should have voted for it.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MINNEAPOLIS.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, the sundry civil appropriation bill is in rapid process of preparation for report to the Senate, and we may look for it in the next day or two. There are several public building bills on the Calendar for which provision ought to be made on the sundry civil bill, and I ask unanimous consent now that we may proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1799. It will not take more than ten or fifteen minutes to get through with all these bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1920) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Minneapolis, Minn."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROOMS IN TOWN HALL BUILDING, JACKSON, MISS.

Mr. MAHONE. Now, I move to take up Order of Business 1892, being Senate joint resolution No. 51.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts to the city of Jackson, Miss.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SANTA FÉ, N. MEX.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. 9371) being Order of Business 1872.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9371) for the completion of a public building at Santa Fé, N. Mex.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHESTER, PA.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (S. 2303) being Order of Business 1893.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2303) for the erection of a public building at Chester, Pa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (S. 3001) being Order of Business 1907.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 3001) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 37, after the words "provided further" to strike out:

"That in the purchase of said site, and in the construction and proper equipment of said building, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized, and is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey the present property of the United States in said city now occupied as a public building, with the site thereof, and to appropriate and apply the proceeds therefrom to said purchase of said site or to the construction of said building, and the proper furnishing and equipment thereof, in addition to any sum herein otherwise appropriated."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever, in his judgment, the public interest will admit, in his discretion, to sell and convey the present property of the United States in said city now occupied as a public building, with the site thereof, the proceeds of the sale of said property to be covered into the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 2, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

In addition to the clear proceeds from the sale and conveyance of any property of the United States designated in the next preceding section.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $1,200,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MORGAN CITY, LA.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to take up the bill (S. 1322) being Order of Business 1908.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1322) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Morgan City (port of Brashear), State of Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ABINGDON, VA.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. 2539) being Order of Business 1909.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 2539) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange property purchased at Abingdon, Va., as a site or a public building, for more suitable property, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was at the end of section 1, to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That such other or new site so secured shall not be located east of the site now owned by the United States and herein authorized to be exchanged.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the construction of such building at Abingdon, Va., as will furnish such accommodations for the United States courts and the post-office there as the business of each now require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7218) being Order of Business 1910.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 7218) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.," approved February 25, 1885, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with amendments in line 8, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the word "hundred," to strike out "and fifty;" in line 17, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two," and in the same line, after the word "hundred," to strike out the words "and fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.," approved February 25, 1885, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to provide that the cost of said building, including site and building complete, shall not exceed the sum of $200,000: Provided, That the site shall not be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum of $200,000 for site and building.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (H. R. 191) being Order of Business 1911.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 191) providing for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (S. 2908) being Ordr of Business 1912.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2908) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there is a House bill of the same title.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose to ask the Senator from Virginia if there was a House bill on the same subject and for the same object reported this morning.

Mr. MAHONE. Yes, sir; Order of Business 2132.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask for the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. MAHONE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the House bill on the same subject will be considered before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C.

Mr. HAMPTON. I think that the Senate bill provides for an appropriation of $400,000, and if I caught the reading of the House bill aright it provides for $300,000. I think it is best, to avoid any complication or any difference between the two Houses, that we should accept the reduction, and I am perfectly willing to allow the House bill to pass without amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JEFFERSON, TEX.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. 9644) being Order of Business 1935.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 9644) for the erection of a public building at Jefferson, Tex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BECK. I have been listening with some care and I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia whether all these bills carry their own appropriations, or must they go to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MAHONE. Some carry their own appropriations and some do not. Some of them will have to go to that committee. I have only three more to get through.

Mr. BECK. The committee meets for the last time on the sundry civil bill to-morrow morning, and all which do not carry appropriations ought to be passed to-night.

Mr. MAHONE. We shall be through in five minutes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HASTINGS, NEBR.

Mr. MAHONE. I now move to take up the bill (S. 1974) being Order of Business 1936.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1974) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Hastings, Nebr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment in line 6, after the words "accommodation of," to insert "United States court to be located there;" so as to make the bill read.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase a site and to cause to be erected at the city of Hastings, in the State of Nebraska, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of United States court to be located there, the post-office, and other Government offices in said city, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story; the site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $100,000; and the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building: Provided, That there shall be an open space of not less than 50 feet upon every side of said building, including streets and alleys, and that no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Nebraska shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, the title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HANOVER, N. H.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (S. 3121) being Order of Business 1994.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 3121) for the erection of a public building at Hanover, N. H., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWARK, N. J.

Mr. MAHONE. I move now to take up the bill (S. 3055) being Order of Business 2002.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 3055) for the extension and repair of the public building at Newark, N. J., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BECK. I move to take up the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to inquire what is the position of the bill (S. 372) known as the agricultural experiment-station bill, which was by vote of the Senate this morning postponed until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the bill of the Senator from Kentucky is taken up it will become the unfinished business, unless the Senate disposes of it before adjournment. If the bill is taken up it becomes the unfinished business of to-morrow, unless it be disposed of before adjournment to-day.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator withhold the motion a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that the present occupant of the chair was not occupying the chair when the motion passed by which the unfinished business, the agricultural experiment-station bill, was postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock. It is the unfinished business by vote of the Senate to-morrow at 2 o'clock. That was the vote of the Senate.

The motion was to postpone the unfinished business until 2 o'clock to-morrow. That motion carried. Thereupon I moved to take up the suffrage resolution, so that the unfinished business of which the Senator from Mississippi is in charge will be in order by vote of the Senate to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate should adjourn at this moment the motion of the Senator from Kentucky would fall necessarily, because the Senate has not acted on it. If the motion to adjourn is voted down and the bill proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is taken up, it will be in order and supersede the special order for to-morrow. The unfinished business always supersedes a special order. The Chair states the rule so that Senators may vote understandingly. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky will have precisely the same right to make the motion to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BECK. As soon as the morning business is over to-morrow morning I will make the motion I have now made. I withdraw it for the time being. I do not want to embarrass Senators.

Mr. HARRIS. You can insist on it now.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to embarrass anybody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 26, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 25, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as related to the introduction of bills and resolutions was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. LAWLER obtained unanimous consent that the following letter, addressed to him by Admiral Porter, in relation to coast defenses, should be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House:

LETTER OF ADMIRAL PORTER.

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: In addition to the information I have already furnished in my report to the Secretary of the Navy, I would first refer you to the report of the board ordered by the President May 12, 1885, consisting of the following:

Hon. William C. Endicott, Secretary of War, president.
Brig. Gen. Stephen V. Benét, Chief of Ordnance.
Brig. Gen. John Newton, Chief of Engineers.
Lieut. Col. Henry L. Abbot, Corps of Engineers.
Capt. Charles S. Smith, Ordnance Department.
Commander William T. Sampson, United States Navy.
Commander Casper F. Goodrich, United States Navy.
Mr. Joseph Morgan, jr., of Pennsylvania.
Mr. Erastus Corning, of New York.

The reports of the Chief of Engineers of the Army have annually laid before the country the condition of the national defenses, and attention is especially invited to those of 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1884. These reports are conclusive, and show the miserable state of the defenses all along the coast of the United States.

The board on fortifications and other defense represent the following harbors as entirely defenseless:

1. New York.
2. San Francisco.
3. Boston.
4. The lake ports.
5. Hampton Roads.
6. New Orleans.
7. Philadelphia.
8. Washington.
9. Baltimore.
10. Portland, Me.
11. Rhode Island ports in Narragansett Bay.
12. Key West.
13. Charleston, S. C.
14. Mobile.
15. New London.
16. Savannah.
17. Galveston.
18. Portland, Oreg.
19. Pensacola, Fla.
20. Wilmington, N. C.
21. San Diego, Cal.
22. Portsmouth, N. H.
23. Defenses of Cumberland Sound at Fort Clinch.
24. Defenses of ports of the Kennebec River at Fort Popham.
25. New Bedford, Mass.
26. Defenses of ports on the Penobscot River, Maine, at Fort Knox.
27. New Haven, Conn.

NOTE.—Defenses are most urgently required at the first eleven ports named.

These harbors are, to my knowledge, entirely defenseless against a single first-rate armor-clad, which could enter any of them at any time without any difficulty. Twenty heavy iron-clads could in as many days lay every important town on our seaboard under contribution; so that by a well-concerted action by an enemy every harbor on our coast, on the same day, would fall into their hands.

We have a certain amount of submarine and torpedo defenses, which, with proper forts, would be very valuable to assist in keeping out an enemy; but, in the absence of such forts, they would amount to very little. An enemy's fleet would soon batter down any forts that we have, and there would then be no difficulty in taking up the torpedoes or cutting the wires, when the fleet would pass on wheresoeve. they please.

I send you herewith a copy of a report by Commander Casper F. Goodrich, United States Navy, on the capture of Alexandria, Egypt, by the English fleet. We have no port in the United States so thoroughly armed with the best rifled cannon as was the port of Alexandria—two hundred and five guns (not all rifled, however) being brought to bear on the English—yet in ten and one-half hours the British fleet of eight iron-clads and five wooden gun-boats, carrying thirty-nine heavy guns and the secondary battery now usual in modern ships, knocked the forts to pieces, dismounted all their heavy guns, and the town lay at their mercy. This result shows in the most striking manner the incapacity of our various coast defenses to resist the attack of an enemy by sea. Attacked by land forces alone, we have soldiers enough in this country to keep out the armies of any one power in Europe. Commander Goodrich's report is well worth perusal, and contains a mine of information and warning.

Our lake-board cities are entirely open to the attacks of the British navy. In twenty-four hours the English could overrun our lakes with gunboats and ironclads by means of the Welland Canal, and we have not a gun to prevent their doing so. We have but one vessel on the lakes (the Michigan), which is entirely unfit for war purposes. The only nation from which we have anything to fear on the lakes is Great Britain, as no other could attack us in that quarter.

You ask: "Is it not vitally essential to the necessities for the public defense that the Army and Navy should be placed in condition of co-operation so far as defenses are concerned?" Unless fortifications are constructed of iron, are able to stand as much hammering as armored vessels, and have much heavier guns than ships can carry, the forts are useless opposed to a fleet provided with the modern heavy rifles and secondary batteries of machine guns. Such forts as ours, no matter what guns they might have, could not stand any time before the fire of heavy batteries afloat, and to beat off an enemy they would require the co-operation of a large force of ironclads equal at least in the character of their guns and armor to the ships attacking the forts.

It is a curious fact that there is no case on record where fleets have been brought to bear against fortifications, and the ships were properly handled and had a sufficient number of guns to keep up a continuous fire, that the forts were not silenced. I merely mention a few instances:

Lord Exmouth attacked Algiers in 1816. At that time Algiers was one of the most strongly fortified places in the world (having 1,000 guns mounted), yet the British fleet (mounting about 900) drove the enemy from their guns and captured the city in a few hours.

Admiral Sir John Duckworth, in 1807, passed the Dardanelles, leading to Constantinople, one of the most strongly defended places in the world and mounting guns carrying 800-pound shot. The fleet sustained little damage from the fire of the Turkish guns, and anchored off Constantinople.

The French bombarded the forts of St. Jean D'Acre (very heavy ones) and the ships gained the day.

In 1839 a small French squadron, under the command of the Prince de Joinville, attacked the great fortress of San Juan d'Ulloa at Vera Cruz, and in a very few hours dismounted most of the guns and destroyed part of the fort.

In the early part of this century the English attacked Havana, which, as we all know, is defended by a wonderful net-work of heavy forts, yet the British fleet went in, anchored, and kept up such a terrible fire that the forts were unable to check them. After having punished the Spaniards sufficiently the fleet cruised before the harbor and blockaded it.

Our own successes during the civil war against Forts Henry and Donelson, Arkansas Post, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, New Orleans, Port Royal, Mobile Bay, Fort Fisher, and other points are only a repetition of what has been done so many times before by a fair number of ships.

And now, since armor-clads have been made almost impenetrable to shot, forts attacked by strong squadrons and unsupported by heavy ships, torpedoes, submarine mines, and obstructions of various kinds will generally succumb to the ships.

Therefore it is a vital necessity in time of war for forts to have the co-operation of naval forces. Many persons go so far as to say that in time of war a strong part of the personnel of a fort should consist of naval officers and seamen, as they are more familiar with the vital parts of the attacking ships and are better judges of how to measure the velocity of a ship under way and how to sight the guns under such circumstances.

To your fourth question I would say that I can not give any comparative statement that would be creditable to the United States Navy. The condition of our navy as regards its ships of war is so discreditable to the nation that I think any American who goes abroad and sees the powerful navies that have been built up by European powers would hang his head with shame, for there is not a nation on earth having any naval pretentions that could not wage war upon our coasts with perfect impunity.

The Chinese, who, a few years ago could boast of nothing better than junks mounting a few guns, have now a navy that could drive our East India squadron from their coast if at any moment complications should arise there; and when we think how often Chinese subjects have been brutally treated in this country it would not be strange if their Government, irritated on some of these occasions, should order our squadron from off their coast, drive the few merchant vessels we have there out to sea, and enforce their edicts, against which we would be powerless to contend.

Japan, which was open to the commerce of the world about 1855, and was slow to adopt a modern system of warfare, has a more powerful navy than the United States. In fact, I can not mention a single nation professing to be a naval power that could not humiliate us to-morrow if so disposed.

The result of our civil war was to set all the nations of the earth to building heavy ironclads and fast cruisers, so that foreign workshops have been filled to overflowing with laboring men building ships of war and making thousands of the heaviest kind of rifled guns, while we have been content to patch our ancient wooden ships and send them abroad with their old cast-iron guns, a laughing-stock for the nations of the earth.

It is a wonder to me that foreign nations have continued to extend to the flag of the United States, in its present weak condition, the respect it once had the power to enforce when its ships and guns were the best in the world. It is a lamentable fact that we are a great nation of people with unlimited resources; wealth superior to that of any nation on the face of the earth, with an overflowing treasury that is really a source of unhappiness to us a large population at the most inclement season of the year asking for work. Yet the representatives of the people, unheeding their cry, seem unconscious of the danger of war that threatens us.

War is a calamity that often comes without premonition. The first thing we know we are likely to be involved in a controversy with some powerful nation, and the next thing we will be aware of will be a fleet of iron-clads anchored in our harbors. There is no nation in the world which would bear such an event less tamely than the American.

We have been singularly exempt from complications with the powers of Europe, and it may look as though we were likely to remain so. Our exemption is owing to the fact that we are so far removed from Europe, and have not meddled with the affairs of foreign nations. We are in many respects very necessary to them, as our granaries feed their huge armies and navies, to say nothing of their laboring classes, when, through failure of their crops, they are reduced to extremities.

But we can not expect to be always exempt from the difficulties that beset nations any more than other powers. Within the last year we have had a difficulty with Canada on the fishing question, which at one time promised to be serious, and nothing but the moderation and good sense of this Government prevented a crisis. Canada, with an improvised navy of two schooners, made actual war upon our fishing interests, captured our vessels on the most trifling pretexts, and scarcely gave them time to meet the requirements imposed upon them by the authorities. Does any one pretend to say that these aggressions would have taken place had the Government of the United States been provided with a force of fifty heavy iron-clads and seventy fast cruisers? I unhesitatingly answer "no."

Nations are measured not by the large amount of property they may own, their ability to raise food for themselves and for others, the benefits they may confer upon mankind, or their liberal form of Government. Foreigners inquire, "What is their military power; what ships have they got to enforce their demands?" And when the American flag is seen abroad only occasionally on a merchant ship, or some miserable frigate crawls into port with our country's ensign at her peak, the Government does not seem entitled to that respect which would be accorded to a nation represented by powerful iron-clads, such as are now encountered in every out-of-the-way corner of the world.

Yet the American citizen demands when abroad, for his country and himself, the same consideration as was accorded to the Roman citizen when Rome was mistress of the world, seeming to expect that, when he says "I am an American citizen," his rights will be respected. He would probably be asked, under present circumstances, "Where is the navy that your vaunted country will send to enforce your demands, and how many gun-boats do you carry in your pocket?"

To your fifth question: What amount in your (my) judgment is necessary to be expended so as to place our Navy on the footing which the United States should enjoy, and the immediate necessities for such outlay? I would remark a parallel case to ours occurred within the last few weeks. The Spanish navy has very much run down, and although Spain has actually ten times the navy that we possess, yet it was felt that her prestige had been so lessened by the decay of her marine that a great exertion was necessary to place it on a footing with that of the other powers of Europe. When the higher officers of the navy represented to the Cortes the necessities of the case that body at once appropriated a sum of $45,000,000 for the rehabilitation of the navy—nearly half of the surplus in our Treasury. Yet Spain has no plethoric vaults, as we have, filled with gold, and kept from circulation, lying in the Treasury and worth no more, as far as usefulness is concerned, than so much sawdust. Although Spain had no money for rebuilding the navy, she hypothecated the Government forests, which had been for centuries the hunting ground of kings and nobles, to provide the necessary funds to reinstate the country in the good opinion of Europe, although the forests are just as sacred in the eyes of Spain as the Escurial, or the Alhambra, or other monument of the past.

Spain, when she found the inefficient condition of her navy, did not hesitate a moment in regard to appropriating a large amount of money; but how different it is in this country! Instead of appropriating so much a year for the gradual increase of the Navy and allowing the Secretary of the Navy to build such ships as are necessary, Congress undertakes to specify the cost and tonnage of each vessel, and money is so appropriated that each ship must cost just so much and no more. There is no sense nor justice in appropriating money in such a manner.

The old rule was to appropriate annually a certain sum for the increase of the Navy in addition to the regular appropriation for the support of the Navy. The present rule of Congress defining the displacement of ships has resulted in the planning and building of eight different classes of vessels—no two alike (except the Boston and Atlanta)—and although the first of the new vessels was commenced nearly four years ago, not one is yet finished, and Congress has several times been called upon for small additional sums, owing to the want of which the ships were very much delayed. I would, therefore, recommend that appropriations for the yearly increase of the Navy be made in a lump sum, and that Congress permit the Navy Department to build the ships, with the proviso that any amount unexpended after the lapse of two years should not be returned to the Treasury, because it is barely possible to build ships with the amount appropriated within that time.

At the present moment there is a stagnation in the ship-building business all over the country, and you, as a public man, must know what a boon it would be to the ship-building interests of every kind to distribute a portion of the surplus revenue among them to enable them to build up the Navy and improve their own plant, which would be so greatly to the advantage of the Government in time of war. At present our private ship-yards, although they may be in condition to build each one or two ships, would find their works very inadequate if called upon to prepare in a hurry a national navy. Therefore, every opportunity should be taken to give the private as well as the public yards sufficient work to enable them not only to exist, but to increase and improve their facilities in such a manner as will best serve the country in time of danger.

I would recommend that the Government appropriate during the next ten years $10,000,000 annually to build up the Navy and put it in position to bid defiance to any power on earth.

I have not the faintest idea of gaining a single advocate to such a measure as this, as it would be considered too extravagant, while many millions are yearly devoted to rivers and harbors, notwithstanding it is well known that a large portion of this money is not judiciously expended.

It is not only the great mass of working people who are thrown out of employment by the stoppage of our ship-yards, but there are a hundred interests all over the country connected with ship-building which are feeling the depression. If Congress were at this moment to embrace warmly the project of building up the Navy it would add a new impetus to the work-shops all over the country, and, labor being cheaper than it has been before for some time, ships could be built at a very moderate price. By having continuous appropriations from year to year the suffering workers in our ship-yards all over the country would be permanently relieved.

Ours is the only country in the world that once owned a magnificent foreign commerce, and has deliberately thrown it away. During the years of its decadence we have done nothing to build it up again, while the great powers of Europe are striving with all their might to develop their foreign commerce, and to push it to the remotest corners of the earth wherever it will yield good fruit. Our ocean commerce is coexistent with the Navy. As it declined the Navy declined with it, and at this day both Navy and mercantile marine present a spectacle not paralleled in any other country.

In one respect our Navy and mercantile marine are much alike. They have been left severely alone by those whose business it was to see them kept in good condition. The foreign commerce of a great country is one of the links which binds the body politic together, and there is not a single industry which is not in some way affected by commerce. Any nation that allows its commerce to fall to decay will run the risk of losing its position as one of the great powers of the earth, and from present appearances we seem to be doomed to be counted out, both as a naval power and commercial one. What would Great Britain be to-morrow without her mighty commerce? Suppose her legislators had sat quietly year after year and seen her commerce slipping away from her, as has been the case with us, or, worse than all, see another nation seize all her carrying trade to the tune of $150,000,000 per annum. This is exactly our condition. We have allowed Great Britain to take away our carrying trade, and we have not to-day what I consider a first-class steamship in our whole mercantile marine.

While Congress is protecting a great many articles which the mass of the people think ought to be allowed to go free, it does nothing to protect our commerce. Hence it is the Navy falls into decay, having no commerce to guard, and our legislators appearing to think there is nothing else for a navy to do, local politics rule the day, and it is thus that among the conflicts of parties our commerce has been ignored so many years.

I can not at this moment recall any act of real benefit to our commerce that has passed Congress in twenty years. Some few measures have been brought forward for its relief, but nothing that would tempt people to establish ship-building yards and construct large ships as they do in England, which is at this moment the center where ships of war are built for all foreign nations, while no one thinks of coming to this country to have an iron vessel built.

The Navy has been treated worse than our ocean mercantile marine. We have for years beheld the whole world making preparation for war on a large scale, and the ocean has been tracked by the leviathan ships of war passing to and fro and protecting the commerce of their countries. Hundreds of these great armored vessels have been built for foreign powers, while the United States Government possesses but one iron vessel abroad—the little tug Palos—sent to China years ago to operate in those waters, and capable of carrying only a boat howitzer. For aught I know this formidable vessel may at this moment be flying the flag of the commander-in-chief of our naval forces until the Brooklyn, now on the way, reaches the Asiatic station. That would be a fine sight to greet the eyes of American citizens abroad, among whom are the greatest sticklers for the respect which should be shown the flag. This respect will never be accorded by foreigners until the United States ensign is carried at the peak of vessels suited to represent the majesty of our nation.

An unarmored wooden vessel with pot-metal guns at this moment no more represents the power of a nation than a policeman without his baton, revolver, steel-lined cap, and brass-bound coat represents the majesty of the law. I have no doubt that the representatives of foreign nations laugh in their sleeves when buncombe speeches are delivered in favor of supporting the Monroe doctrine by the power of our Navy—a navy which exists only on paper.

In the last ten years—and I think the people will be surprised when they know it—the grand total appropriated for the increase of the Navy has been $5,647,617. The result is that the Navy has dwindled to twenty-eight vessels that can be actually used for active service. Twenty of these are only third-rates and five of them fourth-rates or about equivalent to tugs. The rest of our Navy is represented by fifty vessels, including old frigates, the pride of the nation in their day, laid up in "Rotten Row;" old iron-clads or monitors that have been allowed under our naval system to go to decay, five iron-clads that are under contract and may be finished some of these days, thirteen tugs that might be taken for three-deckers from their high-sounding names, twelve sailing ships, built many years ago and most of them laid up. Not one of the old vessels can be used for any purpose except as a receiving ship for recruits, and not one of the active sea-going vessels could stand against a modern-built gunboat, firing machine shells, which burst on impact, for in five minutes after the commencement of the action she would be in flames from bow to taffrail.

The real Navy of the United States consists of the following named vessels:

Name.	Tons.	No. guns.	Caliber.	Speed.	Condition.
			Inches.
Amphritrite	3,815	4	10	12	Incomplete.
Monadnock	3,815	4	10	12	Do.

If war were to break out to-morrow not one of the above, the Dolphin excepted, would be able to fire a gun for months to come. Thirteen of the vessels are still in embryo, and if no greater haste is made to finish them than has been hitherto exercised the probability is that the fashions will so change before they are completed that they will be nearly useless for war purposes.

To your last question, "Is the present complement of officers and sailors sufficient for an increased navy?" I would reply that at the present rate of doing things it will be many years before the existing number of officers and men will be absorbed in ships afloat, because, if we should be so unfortunate as to get in the next ten years, as we have done in the past, only $5,647,617, every ship now in the Navy to which we confidingly trust the honor of our flag will have disappeared from the list through the decay which overtakes a wooden vessel after a certain number of years of active service. Eight years hence there will not be a single wooden vessel now in the Navy fit to go outside of Sandy Hook. This is a humiliating story to tell, but it is re-echoed pretty much by every chief of bureau in the Navy Department, and the sooner the truth is known all over the land the better it will be for the country.

I have given you a list of ships which I call the real Navy of the United States, but here again when we look closely at these vessels we find once more the weakness of this country. None of these vessels have guns with the exception of the Atlanta and Dolphin. The former has two 8-inch and six 6-inch breech-loading rifle guns, and the latter one 6-inch rifle and some machine guns. It will be from one to two months before the Atlanta will have her guns mounted. We are building at the Washington navy-yard new improved rifles equal in workmanship to any in the world, and the Bureau of Ordnance is hard at work on the batteries for the Chicago and Boston, which will make when finished eight 8-inch, nineteen 6-inch, and two 5-inch; in all, twenty-nine as the sum total of all the new high-powered guns contained in the United States Navy; and, to give you an idea of the paucity of resources of this favored land, most of the forgings for the tubes and jackets for these guns were furnished by manufacturers in England. Purchasing steel forgings abroad may be considered humiliating for Americans, but it is no more so than buying anything else there that can be furnished better than here or that we can not furnish at all.

Great Britain, Germany, and France have taken long strides ahead of us in gun-making, and it will require many years of hard work before we can hope to attain the same position they have; but we must "put our shoulders to the wheel" and go to work; take some of that large surplus in the Treasury and put it into steel foundries wherever you find persons able, willing, and competent to undertake gun-making.

It is not twenty, nor forty, nor a hundred guns that we require, but it is thousands of them, especially in a country whose motto seems to be "festina lente." England has such a start of us that she has to-day 7,000 rifled guns that she can bring into action in time of war, France has 6,000, and Russia about 5,000. Here you have at once three leading naval powers combined with 18,000 high-powered guns, while we can boast of but 29. We have some old 8-inch rifles, converted from 11-inch smooth-bores, by which a good smooth-bore was spoiled and a poor rifle was made.

You will naturally ask, what is to be done under these circumstances? First, we should not lose a week in starting to establish foundries all over the United States on the plans presented by boards created by Congress. Second, though I am sorry to be obliged to recommend it, we should go abroad and purchase guns of the best material from makers who will furnish them to us in the shortest space of time. We are not yet skilled in this branch of war workings, and we must go to those who are until we have built up our own works for fabricating guns of all kinds. I shall, for one, be very glad to see all this work done by our own artisans, for there is no greater advocate for giving all the work to be done for the naval and military establishments to the laboring class of this country. But when I see the United States helpless for the means of immediate defense, I must lay aside my sentimentality on this subject and take a common-sense view of the matter.

There should be at least six hundred of the heaviest high-powered guns purchased abroad at once for the use of the Army and Navy, so as to have armaments for our ships as soon as they are built, and to be able to defend the principal cities of the Union, which are liable to be attacked by any nation. It is not Great Britain, Russia, France, or Germany that we have to fear in our weakness so much as some of the small South American countries. Even Venezuela is about purchasing iron-clads in Europe, it is supposed to resist the mild demands made upon her by this Government for many years. She finds it cheaper to buy iron-clads than to pay a debt that does not altogether meet her ideas of justice.

We have, accessible to any sized cruiser, many large harbors with great cities on their shores with not a gun mounted to defend them. As we can not supply ourselves fast enough, let us invoke the aid of Armstrong, Krupp, Whitworth, and Schneider to put us once more on our feet. Then we will, I think, by that time be able to walk alone, but there is no way out of the present difficulty other than the one I propose. The system of making guns by driblets will never amount to anything. To provide the country with heavy ordnance in the way we propose to go to work is very much like trying to blow a passage through the Rocky Mountains by means of pistol cartridges.

You will see from what I have said that our position is not an enviable one, but that we have it within our own reach to put ourselves on a proper footing in a very short time.

Let us now take a look at the important possessions of the United States on the Pacific coast, California, Oregon, and Washington Territory. In the great State first named a large city, the commercial center of the vast agricultural and mining interest, lies at the mercy of a single frigate. All the harbors on the coast of Oregon could be closed by two or three gun-boats. That beautiful inland sea in Washington Territory, Puget Sound, where are already laid the foundations of a mighty empire, is left entirely unprotected and liable to fall into the hands of any one of the great powers that chooses to take possession.

The fortifications possessed by the United States on Puget Sound are unworthy of the name of forts. Across the straits of Juan de Fuca the English have a navy-yard at Esquimault, a short distance west of the city of Victoria. Prominent engineer officers of the British army have very recently thoroughly surveyed Esquimault and Victoria with a view of adding to their already strong defenses. Hardly was the ink dry on the paper which announced this survey than we read of an immense quantity of heavy rifle guns and ordnance stores of all kinds on their way, via the Canadian Pacific Railway, to arm the projected forts.

Mark the difference between Great Britain's action and that of the United States, and see how the former stretches her hand out over her possessions, makes the land flourish wherever she owns an acre, extends her protecting arm over every citizen under her flag, and, even in the most obscure places, builds forts that can defy force, and maintains a squadron able to defend her citizens.

We, sitting here quietly, hardly realize that such a magnificent channel of trade as Puget Sound exists or that we have any rights there, while the Canadian Pacific Railway is now completed, and it is said that arrangements are perfected by which freight and passengers can be promptly transferred by rail and steamships from London, via Montreal, to Victoria, and thence by steamer to Yokohama and Hong Kong. There is enterprise for you, well calculated to throw the boasted enterprise of Americans into the shade. The nations of the earth are looking for the shortest route to and from China. The nation that can retain possession of the Eastern trade will be the richest on earth.

But all these advantages can only be had and maintained by keeping up a strong naval force. Some people talk about a small but efficient navy. How can you expect the navy to be efficient when it is small? Its efficiency depends not only on the excellence of its ships and their equipment, but also on their number. We do not need a large army; we want a small but efficient army, as on every company of such an army we can ingraft half a dozen regiments, so that in a month we can raise six millions of men. But you can do nothing for the navy in a month, nor in a year, nor in two years. You must therefore begin and build ahead to supply naval demands, and, as I have said before, the best thing for Congress to do is to appropriate for a general increase yearly, and leave it to the Navy Department to build the ships according to the requirements of the Navy at the time, and to bother itself no more about it except to hold the Department and its assistants to a strict accountability and see that their work is better done, if possible, than is the case elsewhere.

I do not think I can say much more on this subject or advocate the claims of the Navy in warmer terms than I have. It would require a large book to hold all that could be said on the subject. I will therefore simply content myself by referring you to the able report of the board on fortifications or other defense, and its appendices, and by giving you a few lines of lately written history, which seem to be applicable to the present case:

"It is no compliment to the intelligence of sixty millions of people to have it said that the United States has not one ironclad to defend her coast; not a perfectly equipped cruiser of steel to carry her flag on the ocean; not a single gun in her coast defenses that would pierce the shield of a foreign ironclad, and not a fortification that could resist the attack of two or three of the same. We may be said to be a great nation of people, but certainly not a nation of great people; for, who will call us the latter when there seems to be such a love of accumulating wealth without the manly desire to have the means of defending it against the aggressions of any power that may choose to make war upon us? The Government of the United States can not defend itself against the weakest naval power, much less against a strong one, and we must, perforce, rely on that old system, so much in vogue in Thomas Jefferson's time, of paying tribute, as we did to the Barbary Powers, to prevent them from preying on our commerce and carrying our citizens into captivity.

"We had experience enough during our civil war to satisfy us that there were certain European governments that desired the downfall of the American Union, and it was only by means of an abject compliance with their demands that we escaped war, which would have been the signal of the complete triumph of the South and the disolution of the Union which our forefathers exercised so much wisdom in creating. What a noble sight it would have been, after the settlement of our difficulties at home, to see the American people set to work and construct a navy that would bid defiance to any naval power in the world—to rebuild the commerce that had been driven from the sea by the Alabamas and Floridas, and which was once the pride and wealth of the nation—to give an exhibition of our wealth and resources and our indomitable will that no nation should oppose us or interfere with our domestic affairs. But, instead of this, we stood still while other nations worked on and, taking advantage of our lethargy, robbed us of our commerce, took the carrying trade all in their hands, and now laugh at our inane efforts to build up a navy, which, if it ever reaches a reputable standard, will show that we are so deficient in the elementary science of naval construction that we cannot keep pace even with the modern examples that have been set us by European powers.

"We can be no more exempt from war than others. Indeed, our weak condition is so well understood by all the world that it only invites aggression; and if we would not desire to rest under the imputation of being the poorest Government under the sun, and unfit to take care of the interests of sixty millions of people, we must shortly awake from an apathy that would disgrace any country and begin to provide for the national defense.

"In the civil war the people on both sides exhibited the greatest examples of courage, resource, and perseverance, showing what we could do were our shores to be invaded, for which, no doubt, in the opinion of the world, we have gained that reputation which generally follows heroic deeds; but all that credit would disappear to-morrow if we were involved in a foreign war. Our coasts would be devastated, our harbors blockaded, and we would be again obliged to pay tribute as we did to the Barbary Powers of old.

"Taking into consideration the situation of the United States at the present time, it looks as if the civil war had taught us nothing, and that we are giving wild theorists of the past and present some show of reason to assert that republican forms of government are unnecessarily expensive, revolutionary, and deficient in the elements for the maintenance of a proper protection from an outside enemy or intestine foe. A Government which maintains no army or navy for the preservation of order and law simply runs an even race with anarchy and rebellion. This is true of us in a tenfold degree, for we give our enemies in all quarters the opportunity of getting their forces first in the field. It applies more particularly to the Navy of the United States, which never seems to attract the attention of those who have charge of the national defense.

"The people of the United States can readily dispose of their anarchists on the land and provide against all their revolutionary ideas by the bullet or bayonet when they become tired of listening to these wild theorists who would upset, if they could, any Government, no matter how desirable; but they are helpless when it comes to defending themselves against the attacks of heavy ironclads, which can only be met by great vessels of war designed for the purpose, which we do not possess, and which there seems little prospect of our obtaining.

"There is but one remedy for the evils under which we are resting, and that is for the people to take the matter in hand and demand a navy that will help put down rebellion at home at its first inception and bid defiance to those abroad who would commit aggressions upon our commerce or treat our citizens unjustly in any part of the world.

"Let us not forget that something akin to the Barbary Powers still exists, though in the garb of Christian civilization, and that they were not as limited in numbers as they were in 1804. They may have the strongest treaties binding them to us in terms of amity, but they are ever ready, like the Algerines of old, to take advantage of our weakness."

I neglected, in the proper place, to invite your attention to the report of the gun foundry board. You will find much therein that is of interest regarding the subject you have undertaken to investigate. I shall be repaid for this long letter if I have in any way aided in creating an interest in the Navy of the United States, which is the only defense this country can have in the event of foreign war.

Very respectfully, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER,
Admiral U. S. Navy.

Hon. FRANK LAWLER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

PORTAGE LAKE AND RIVER IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with map and accompanying papers, a report by the Board of Engineers upon the expediency of the acquisition by the Government of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal, and the Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway and Iron Company Canal, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with accompanying maps and papers, a report by the Board of Engineers upon the expediency and desirability of the acquisition by the Government of the Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE DALLES, COLUMBIA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers relative to the proposed survey of the Dalles, Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

RETIRED-LIST FOR PRIVATES AND NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of certain enlisted men, asking that the act authorizing a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers be amended so as to reduce the period of service to twenty-five years; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THIRD-CLASS POST-OFFICES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3128) concerning post-offices of the third class; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BENNETT, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ATKINSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House, without leaving copies, was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. DORSEY, in the case of George Reynolds.

To Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, in the case of William R. Tubbs.

APPOINTMENT OF HOUSE CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following conference committees on the part of the House, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bills indicated:

Mr. TURNER, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. PAYNE on the bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections.

Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. KLEINER, and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, on the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin.

Mr. SCOTT, Mr. ELDREDGE, and Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR, on the bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce;

A bill (S. 2220) granting a pension to James G. Mathes;

A bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the heirs of Malitty Rose;

A bill (S. 2369) to increase the pension of William H. H. Price;

A bill (S. 2721) to remove the political disabilities of John K. Mitchell;

A bill (S. 2848) for the relief of Benjamin P. Loyall, of the State of Virginia;

A bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights; and

A bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.

SEED DISTRIBUTION IN TEXAS.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 10203, and that it be now considered.

The bill (H. R. 10203), to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken counties of Texas, and making an appropriation therefor, was read; and also the amendment of the committee to strike out the word "fifty," in the third line of section 2, and insert "ten," so as to make the appropriation $10,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COWLES. It is somewhat surprising to hear gentlemen, who argue on this floor that the educational bill is unconstitutional, make a request like this. I object, and call the regular order.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. 10912) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve all points of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HATCH. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that there are no points of order to be made on this bill.

RHODE ISLAND ELECTION CONTEST—PAGE VS. PIRCE.

Mr. TURNER. I call up the contested-election case of Page vs. Pirce, from the State of Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, as a question of privilege, calls up for present consideration the report of the Committee on Elections upon the contested-election case of Page vs. Pirce, from the State of Rhode Island. The resolution reported by the majority of the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pirce was not elected a member of the House of Representatives from the second Congressional district of Rhode Island, and that the seat be declared vacant.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, by an understanding with the minority of the Committee on Elections, I desire to ask consent of the House that this debate shall be limited to four hours, two hours on each side, with the privilege to me of calling the previous question short of the two hours on our side if the time shall not be occupied on our part.

Mr. ROWELL. With the understanding that in addition to that the contestee may be heard, if he desires it?

Mr. TURNER. No; I insist that the understanding shall be that the debate go on not to exceed four hours, two hours to be allowed to each side, if they desire to occupy it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. ROWELL. I have suggested that in case the contestee desires to be heard he should have the privilege outside of the four hours.

Mr. TURNER. I can not agree to that.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall not object if an understanding can be reached that my colleague, the contestee, be entitled to speak in addition to the time allotted for general debate. That is customary at least by courtesy in all such cases in this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to reserve an objection until I can ask a question.

Mr. TURNER. I would be glad to accommodate myself to the suggestion made, but I think two hours is ample, this question having been discussed for some time during the last session of Congress. This, as gentlemen well know, is the short session, and I have arranged with other gentlemen competing for the floor, and have obtained their consent by the assurance that this debate should not extend beyond the four hours. Gentlemen can therefore readily see why I am unable to yield further time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before agreeing to the request for unanimous consent I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the committee have reported in favor of the sitting member?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read, and may be again reported, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the minority desires to present a substitute.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that will also be considered as pending.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia as to the limit of debate?

Mr. SPOONER. I object, unless the contestee is allowed, as has been always the case, at least since I have been a member of this House, the opportunity of speaking himself upon this question.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Is he present?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER. As no arrangement seems to be practicable, under the circumstances, in order to keep faith with gentlemen to whom I have pledged my word, I will have to pass away from the request for unanimous consent, and notify the House that I will endeavor to rely upon it to support me in the demand for the previous question at the proper time.

I now yield to the minority of the committee, reserving my time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be much better for the members of the House if the majority of this committee would state their position and give some reasons on which they rely for unseating Mr. PIRCE. The minority are, of course, to combat the positions assumed by the majority; but without stating any position at all, it leaves the House in the dark.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. It ought to be read.

Mr. TURNER. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], with reference to the position taken by the committee in this report, it will be sufficient to say that I, on my part, intend to rely entirely upon the citations of evidence I have adduced in the report of the committee.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as probably not half a dozen members of the House outside of the Committee on Elections have ever read the evidence in a case where they are to act both as court and jury, I think I have a right to ask that attention be given to the discussion of this evidence by those who have examined it. We are about to investigate the right of the sitting member from the second district of Rhode Island to retain his seat on this floor; to investigate the question of whether or not the second district of Rhode Island for the balance of the Forty-ninth Congress shall be represented at all.

It is certainly a right of as great moment as the right of a claimant to a few dollars of money in court; and this contestee, this sitting member, has a right to demand of this House that, in acting as court and jury upon his rights they shall act understandingly; that they shall not only act understandingly but that they shall have regard for the rules of law which govern the rights of every American citizen.

I know it is the custom of members of the House to rely upon the opinions of some one who may have investigated, and act upon his judgment; but in a case like this I ask an independent judgment of every member of the House, because I know of no more important question to be decided than the question of whether or not a gentleman holding a seat, or claiming a seat, in this representative body of the American people is there of right or is to be deprived of his seat without right; and I ask this the more because of a little history connected with this contest, to which I ask the attention of this House for a few moments.

I ask it because that history will show that much of the testimony has been taken not only without authority of law but absolutely in violation of well-recognized rules of evidence established for the furtherance of justice and as a protection against false swearing.

The contestant in this case filed his notice of contest upon the theory that the law of Rhode Island was of such character that the elections held under it, and in pursuance of that law, were not such valid elections as this House would recognize when considering the rights of contestee; that a ballot cast under that law for contestee should not be considered in the House of his friends, and that although the sitting member received 1,751 votes more than he did, and 16 votes more than all of the various men who were voted for, yet the more than 7,000 votes of the sitting member were to be ruled out, although these votes were upon ballots legal in that State. That formed the principal basis of his contest—that complaint against the statutes of Rhode Island providing for such elections. The law, and not the facts, was the subject for his attack.

I call attention to the further fact that after the board of canvassers had determined that the sitting member was duly elected, and his certificate was issued to him, and after the terms of members elected to the Forty-ninth Congress had commenced, this contestant became a candidate for and was elected a member of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, entered upon the duties of that office, an office which he could not legally hold while he was at the same time a member of the House of Representatives, and that he thereby gave notice to all the world that he abandoned that contest.

I call attention to the further fact that under that abandonment he neglected to take any steps towards perfecting his contest and bringing it before Congress under the law which Congress had enacted regulating that kind of contest; that he permitted all the time assigned him under that law to take testimony to lapse and all the time assigned to the contestee to take testimony before he proceeded in the case in any manner; that after all that time had expired he then served notice on the contestee that he would proceed to take testimony.

The contestee disregarded that notice as a law-abiding citizen, as he had a right to do, and as was his duty to do if Congress, with the same party in a majority that is now in the majority, had correctly laid down the precedents for our action. Consequently, all of the testimony originally presented to the Committee on Elections was ex parte testimony. It was testimony taken out of the presence of the contestee or of anybody acting for him. Witnesses were examined that were not cross-examined, that were not expected to be cross-examined; the cost of which cross-examination Congress could not award to contestee without disregarding its own law and its rule well established in a former contested-election case.

That testimony was offered before the committee. The committee had no power under the law to act under it and report a resolution upon the question of who was entitled to a seat. Nor did the committee assume any such authority. But they did report a resolution, which was passed by the majority of this House, granting the contestee the right to cross-examine the witnesses whose ex parte testimony was on file, and to examine witness on his own behalf, and to contestant to take testimony in rebuttal. Under that permission of this House the contestee proceeded to cross-examine the witnesses of the contestant—such of them as answered to his subpœna.

Numbers of them refused to answer to that subpœna, and the majority report in this case is based upon the testimony taken ex parte and without law, without cross-examination, where the witnesses de-
